The publication of information concerning action taken in respect of international labour Conventions and Recommendations does not imply any expression of view by the International Labour Office on the legal status of the State having communicated such information (including the communication of a ratification or declaration), or on its authority over the areas or territories in respect of which such information is communicated; in certain cases this may present problems on which the ILO is not competent to express an opinion.

ILO publications can be obtained through major booksellers or ILO local offices in many countries, or direct from ILO Publications, International Labour Office, CH-1211 Geneva 22, Switzerland. A catalogue or list of new publications will be sent free of charge from the above address.

The Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations is an independent body composed of legal experts charged with examining the application of ILO Conventions and Recommendations by ILO member States. The annual report of the Committee of Experts covers numerous matters related to the application of ILO standards. The structure of the report, as modified in 2003, is divided into the following parts:

- (a) The Reader's note provides indications on the Committee of Experts and the Committee on the Application of Standards of the International Labour Conference (their mandate, functioning and the institutional context in which they operate) (Part 1A, pages 1–4).
- (b) Part I: the General Report describes the manner in which the Committee of Experts undertakes its work and the extent to which member States have fulfilled their constitutional obligations in relation to international labour standards, and it draws the attention to issues of general interest arising out of the Committee's work (Part 1A, pages 5–40).
- (c) Part II: Observations concerning particular countries cover the sending of reports, the application of ratified Conventions (see section I), and the obligation to submit instruments to the competent authorities (see section II) (Part 1A, pages 41–813).
- (d) Part III: General Survey, in which the Committee of Experts examines the state of the legislation and practice regarding a specific area covered by a given number of Conventions and Recommendations. This examination covers all member States regardless of whether or not they have ratified the given Conventions. The General Survey is published as a separate volume (Report III (Part 1B)) and this year it concerns social security instruments in light of the 2008 Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization (Part 1B).

Finally, the Information document on ratifications and standards-related activities is prepared by the Office and supplements the information contained in the report of the Committee of Experts. This document primarily provides an overview of recent developments relating to international labour standards, the implementation of special supervisory procedures and technical cooperation in relation to international labour standards. It contains, in tabular form, information on the ratification of Conventions and Protocols, and “country profiles” (Part 2).

The report of the Committee of Experts is also available at: www.ilo.org/ilolex/gbe/ceacr2011.htm.

Reader's note

Overview of the ILO supervisory mechanisms

Since its creation in 1919, the mandate of the International Labour Organization (ILO) has included adopting international labour standards, promoting their ratification and application in its member States and the supervision of their application as a fundamental means of achieving its objectives. In order to monitor the progress of member States in the application of international labour standards, the ILO has developed supervisory mechanisms which are unique at the international level.<sup>1</sup>

Under article 19 of the ILO Constitution, a number of obligations arise for member States upon the adoption of international labour standards, including the requirement to submit newly adopted standards to national competent authorities and the obligation to report at intervals on the measures taken to give effect to the provisions of unratified Conventions and Recommendations.

A number of supervisory mechanisms exist whereby the Organization examines the standards-related obligations of member States deriving from ratified Conventions. This supervision occurs both in the context of a regular procedure through annual reports (article 22 of the ILO Constitution),<sup>2</sup> as well as through special procedures based on complaints or representations to the Governing Body made by ILO constituents (articles 24 and 26 of the Constitution). Moreover, since 1950, a special procedure has existed whereby complaints relating to freedom of association are referred to the Committee on Freedom of Association of the Governing Body. The Committee on Freedom of Association may also examine complaints relating to member States that have not ratified the relevant freedom of association Conventions.

Role of employers' and workers' organizations

As a natural consequence of its tripartite structure, the ILO was the first international organization to associate the social partners directly in its activities. The participation of employers' and workers' organizations in the supervisory mechanism is recognized in the Constitution under article 23, paragraph 2, which provides that reports and information submitted by governments in accordance with articles 19 and 22 must be communicated to the representative organizations.

In practice, representative employers' and workers' organizations may submit to their governments comments on the reports concerning the implementation of ratified Conventions. They may, for instance, draw attention to a discrepancy in law or practice regarding a Convention and thus lead the Committee of Experts to request further information from the government. Furthermore, any employers' or workers' organization may submit comments on the application of Conventions directly to the Office. The Office will then forward these comments to the government concerned, which will have an opportunity to respond before the comments are examined by the Committee of Experts.

<sup>1</sup> For detailed information on all the supervisory procedures, see the Handbook of procedures relating to international labour Conventions and Recommendations, International Labour Standards Department, International Labour Office, Geneva, Rev. 2006.

<sup>2</sup> Reports are requested every two years for the so-called fundamental Conventions and priority Conventions, and every five years for other Conventions. Reports have been due for groups of Conventions according to subject matter. As regards the recent decision taken by the Governing Body concerning the reporting cycle, see para. 29 of the General Report.

Origins of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards and the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations

During the early years of the ILO, both the adoption of international labour standards and the regular supervisory work were undertaken within the framework of the plenary sitting of the annual International Labour Conference. However, the considerable increase in the number of ratifications of Conventions rapidly led to a similarly significant increase in the number of annual reports submitted. It soon became clear that the plenary of the Conference would not be able to examine all of these reports at the same time as adopting standards and discussing other important matters. In response, the Conference in 1926 adopted a resolution<sup>3</sup> establishing on an annual basis a Conference Committee (subsequently named the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards) and requesting the Governing Body to appoint a technical committee (subsequently named the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations) which would be responsible for drawing up a report for the Conference. These two committees have become the two pillars of the ILO supervisory system.

Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations

Composition

The Committee of Experts is composed of 20 members,<sup>4</sup> who are outstanding legal experts at the national and international levels. The members of the Committee are appointed by the Governing Body upon the proposal of the Director-General. Appointments are made in a personal capacity from among completely impartial persons of competence and independent standing drawn from all regions of the world, in order to enable the Committee to have at its disposal first-hand experience of different legal, economic and social systems. The appointments are made for renewable periods of three years. In 2002, the Committee decided that there would be a limit of 15 years' service for all members, representing a maximum of four renewals after the first three-year appointment. At its 79th Session (November–December 2008), the Committee decided that its Chairperson would be elected for a period of three years, which would be renewable once for a further three years. At the start of each session, the Committee would also elect a Reporter.

Mandate

The Committee of Experts meets annually in November–December. In accordance with the mandate given by the Governing Body,<sup>5</sup> the Committee is called upon to examine the following:

- the annual reports under article 22 of the Constitution on the measures taken by member States to give effect to the provisions of the Conventions to which they are parties;
- the information and reports concerning Conventions and Recommendations communicated by member States in accordance with article 19 of the Constitution;
- information and reports on the measures taken by member States in accordance with article 35 of the Constitution.<sup>6</sup>

The task of the Committee of Experts is to indicate the extent to which each member State's legislation and practice are in conformity with ratified Conventions and the extent to which member States have fulfilled their obligations under the ILO Constitution in relation to standards. In carrying out this task, the Committee adheres to its principles of independence, objectivity and impartiality.<sup>7</sup>

The comments of the Committee of Experts on the fulfilment by member States of their standards-related obligations take the form of either observations or direct requests. Observations contain comments on fundamental questions raised <sup>5</sup> Terms of reference of the Committee of Experts, Minutes of the 103rd Session of the Governing Body (1947), Appendix XII, para. 37.

<sup>6</sup> Article 35 covers the application of Conventions to non-metropolitan territories.

<sup>7</sup> In its 1987 report, the Committee stated that in its evaluation of national law and practice in relation to the requirements of international labour Conventions: "... its function is to determine whether the requirements of a given Convention are being met, whatever the economic and social conditions existing in a given country. Subject only to any derogations, which are expressly permitted by the Convention itself, these requirements remain constant and uniform for all countries. In carrying out this work, the Committee is guided by the standards laid down in the Convention alone, mindful, however, of the fact that the modes of their implementation may be different in different States". by the application of a particular Convention by a member State. These observations are reproduced in the annual report of the Committee of Experts, which is then submitted to the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June every year. Direct requests usually relate to questions of a more technical nature or of lesser importance. They are not published in the report of the Committee of Experts, but are communicated directly to the government concerned.<sup>8</sup> In addition, the Committee of Experts examines, in the context of the General Survey, the state of the legislation and practice concerning a specific area covered by a given number of Conventions and Recommendations chosen by the Governing Body. The General Survey is based on the reports submitted in accordance with articles 19 and 22 of the Constitution, and it covers all member States regardless of whether or not they have ratified the concerned Conventions. This year's General Survey covers social security. Pursuant to the decision taken by the Governing Body at its 303rd Session (November 2008), the subjects of General Surveys have been aligned with the four strategic objectives of the ILO as set out in the ILO Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization, 2008 (the Social Justice Declaration).<sup>9</sup>

Report of the Committee of Experts

As a result of its work, the Committee produces an annual report. The report consists of two volumes. The first volume (Report III 1A)<sup>10</sup> is divided into two parts:

- Part I: the General Report describes, on the one hand, the progress of the work of the Committee of Experts and specific matters relating to it that have been addressed by the Committee and, on the other hand, the extent to which member States have fulfilled their constitutional obligations in relation to international labour standards.
- Part II: Observations concerning particular countries on the fulfilment of obligations in respect of the submission of reports, the application of ratified Conventions grouped by subject matter and the obligation to submit instruments to the competent authorities.

The second volume contains the General Survey (Report III (Part 1B)).<sup>11</sup>

Furthermore, an Information document on ratifications and standards-related activities (Report III (Part 2)) accompanies the report of the Committee of Experts.<sup>12</sup>

Committee on the Application of Standards of the International Labour Conference

Composition

The Conference Committee on the Application of Standards is one of the two standing committees of the Conference. It is tripartite and therefore comprises representatives of governments, employers and workers. At each session, the Committee elects its Officers, which include a Chairperson (Government member), two Vice-Chairpersons (Employer member and Worker member) and a Reporter (Government member).

Mandate

The Conference Committee on the Application of Standards meets annually at the June session of the Conference. Pursuant to article 7 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the Committee shall consider:

- measures taken to give effect to ratified Conventions (article 22 of the Constitution);
- reports communicated in accordance with article 19 of the Constitution (General Surveys);
- measures taken in accordance with article 35 of the Constitution (non-metropolitan territories).

The Committee is required to present a report to the Conference.

<sup>8</sup> Observations and direct requests are accessible through the ILOLEX database, which is available on CD-ROM and accessible via <http://www.ilo.org/ilolex/english/index.htm>.

<sup>9</sup> By virtue of the follow-up to the Social Justice Declaration, a system of annual recurrent discussions in the framework of the Conference has been established to enable the Organization to gain a better understanding of the situation and varying needs of its members in relation to the four strategic objectives of the ILO, namely: employment; social protection; social dialogue and tripartism; and fundamental principles and rights at work. The Governing Body considered that the recurrent reports prepared by the Office for the purposes of the Conference discussion should benefit from the information on the law and practice of member States contained in General Surveys, as well as from the outcome of the discussions of General Surveys by the Conference Committee.

<sup>10</sup> This citation reflects the agenda of the International Labour Conference, which contains as a permanent item, item III relating to information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations.

<sup>12</sup> This document provides an overview of recent developments relating to international labour standards, the implementation of special procedures and technical cooperation in relation to international labour standards. It also contains, in the form of tables, full information on the ratification of Conventions, together with "country profiles" containing key information on standards for each country.

Following the independent technical examination carried out by the Committee of Experts, the proceedings of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards provide an opportunity for the representatives of governments, employers and workers to examine together the manner in which States are fulfilling their standards-related obligations, particularly with regard to ratified Conventions. Governments are able to elaborate on information previously supplied to the Committee of Experts, indicate any further measures taken or proposed since the last session of the Committee of Experts, draw attention to difficulties encountered in the fulfilment of obligations and seek guidance as to how to overcome such difficulties.

The Conference Committee on the Application of Standards discusses the report and the General Survey of the Committee of Experts, and the documents submitted by governments. The work of the Conference Committee starts with a general discussion based essentially on the General Report of the Committee of Experts, and with a discussion on the General Survey. With regard to the alignment of the subject of General Surveys with the strategic objective discussed in the context of the recurrent report under the follow-up to the Social Justice Declaration, the outcome of the discussion of the Conference Committee concerning the General Survey is transmitted to the Conference Committee responsible for examining the recurrent report. Following its general discussion, the Conference Committee examines cases of serious failure to fulfil reporting and other standards-related obligations. Finally, the Conference Committee embarks upon its main task, which is to examine a number of individual cases concerning the application of ratified Conventions which have been the subject of observations by the Committee of Experts. The Conference Committee invites the Government representatives concerned to attend one of its sittings to discuss the observations in question. After listening to the Government representatives, the members of the Conference Committee may ask questions or make comments. At the end of the discussion, the Conference Committee adopts conclusions on the case in question. Furthermore, in accordance with a resolution adopted by the Conference in 2000,<sup>13</sup> the Conference Committee holds, at each of its sessions, a special sitting on the application by Myanmar of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29).

In its report<sup>14</sup> submitted to the plenary sitting of the Conference for adoption, the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards may invite the member State whose case has been discussed to accept a technical assistance mission by the International Labour Office to increase its capacity to fulfil its obligations, or may propose other types of missions. The Conference Committee may also request a government to submit additional information or address specific concerns in its next report to the Committee of Experts. The Conference Committee also draws the attention of the Conference to certain cases, such as cases of progress and cases of serious failure to comply with ratified Conventions.

Relations between the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards

In numerous reports, the Committee of Experts has emphasized the importance of the spirit of mutual respect, cooperation and responsibility that has always existed in relations between the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee. It has accordingly become the practice for the Chairperson of the Committee of Experts to attend the general discussion of the Conference Committee including the discussion on the General Survey as an observer, with the opportunity to address the Conference Committee at the opening of the general discussion and to make remarks at the end of the discussion on the General Survey. Similarly, the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons of the Conference Committee are invited to meet the Committee of Experts during its sessions and discuss issues of common interest within the framework of a special session held for that purpose.

Part I. General Report

I. Introduction

1. The Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, appointed by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to examine the information and reports submitted under articles 19, 22 and 35 of the Constitution by member States of the International Labour Organization on the action taken with regard to Conventions and Recommendations, held its 81st Session in Geneva from 25 November to 10 December 2010. The Committee has the honour to present its report to the Governing Body.

Composition of the Committee

2. The composition of the Committee is as follows: Mr Mario ACKERMAN (Argentina), Mr Anwar Ahmad Rashed AL FUZAIE (Kuwait), Mr Denys BARROW, SC (Belize), Mr Lelio BENTES CORRÊA (Brazil), Mr James J. BRUDNEY (United States), Mr Halton CHEADLE (South Africa), Ms Laura COX, QC (United Kingdom), Ms Graciela Josefina DIXON CARTON (Panama), Mr Rachid FILALI MEKNASSI (Morocco), Mr Abdul G. KOROMA (Sierra Leone), Mr Pierre LYON-CAEN (France), Ms Elena MACHULSKAYA (Russian Federation), Mr Vitit MUNTARBHORN (Thailand), Ms Angelika NUSSBERGER, MA (Germany), Ms Rosemary OWENS (Australia), Ms Ruma PAL (India), Mr Paul-Gérard POUGOUÉ (Cameroon), Mr Raymond RANJEVA (Madagascar), Mr Yozo YOKOTA (Japan). Appendix I of the General Report contains brief biographies of all the Committee members.

3. The Committee notes with regret that Ms Cox was unable to participate in its work this year. The Committee expresses its gratitude to the Director-General for his personal intervention with the authorities of Madagascar with a view to facilitating Mr Ranjeva's travel to enable him to participate in the current session of the Committee. The Committee notes that Ms Nussberger has submitted her resignation in view of her nomination to the European Court of Human Rights as from January 2011. The Committee would like to express its deep appreciation of the outstanding manner in which Ms Nussberger discharged her duties during her six years of service on the Committee.

4. During its session, the Committee welcomed Ms Rosemary Owens, nominated by the Governing Body at its 307th Session (March 2010), as well as Mr James J. Brudney and Ms Elena Machulskaya, nominated by the Governing Body at its 308th Session (June 2010). In view of her recent nomination by the Governing Body at its 309th Session (November 2010), Ms Graciela Josefina Dixon Carton was not able to participate in the work of the Committee at its present session. The Committee looks forward to being able to welcome her at its next session.

5. In accordance with the decision taken by the Committee at its 80th Session (November–December 2009), Mr Yokota's mandate as Chairperson of the Committee took effect at the beginning of the present session. The Committee re-elected Mr Al-Fuzaie as Reporter.

Working methods

6. The Committee has in recent years undertaken a thorough examination of its working methods. In order to guide this reflection on working methods efficiently, a subcommittee was set up in 2001. The mandate of the subcommittee includes examining the working methods of the Committee and any related subjects, in order to make appropriate recommendations to the Committee.<sup>1</sup> The subcommittee met on three occasions between 2002 to 2004.<sup>2</sup> During its sessions in 2005 and 2006, issues relating to its working methods were discussed by the Committee in plenary sitting.<sup>3</sup> Since 2007, the subcommittee has met at each of the Committee's sessions.<sup>4</sup>

7. This year, the subcommittee on working methods met under the guidance of Ms Pal, who was elected to this function for the first time. The subcommittee undertook a close examination of the comments made on specific aspects of the work of the Committee by members of the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 99th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2010), as well as during the informal tripartite consultations held on the question of the interpretation of international labour Conventions in February, March and November 2010. Following consideration of the recommendations made by the subcommittee, the Committee agreed on the following issues.

8. With respect to its general observations on the application of Conventions, having heard the concerns expressed during the Conference Committee, the Committee welcomes the opportunity to explain the role of general observations. It notes that making general observations forms part of the normal discharge of its functions and contributes to the effective implementation of the Conventions concerned. It recalls that general observations are valuable tools, to be used on an occasional and timely basis,<sup>5</sup> primarily for two reasons:

- to draw attention to matters or practices which are of broad application across a number of countries;
- and/or to discuss trends in the application of a Convention.

It may be necessary to that end – as is done in individual comments – to request information from member States. In such instances, member States are invited to respond in their regular reports on the application of Conventions. Should the Committee find that a report form on a particular Convention has proven to be insufficient for the purpose of examining the application of this Convention, the Committee will, as it has done on previous occasions, draw this finding to the attention of the Governing Body so that consideration can be given to a possible revision of the report form.<sup>6</sup>

9. With respect to the approach followed by the Committee in relation to cases of progress, it recalls that the matter has twice been discussed extensively in recent years and its conclusion has been published as part of the General Report. The Committee has re-examined the matter and considers that the approach adopted earlier in this respect is sound and clear. It also emphasizes that, in identifying cases of progress, in addition to the information set out in government reports, it closely examines comments made by the employers' and workers' organizations on the application of the Convention. It reiterates that the identification of a case of progress does not necessarily reflect a situation of overall compliance with the Convention by the country in question and that it is limited to a specific issue arising out of the application of the Convention and the nature of the measure taken by the government concerned. However, the Committee acknowledges that it could more effectively highlight the specific elements that are of particular importance to a full understanding of the approach adopted. The Committee has therefore decided to give greater visibility to the description of the approach adopted concerning cases of progress in its General Report.<sup>7</sup> It has also decided that this will be set out at the beginning of Part II<sup>8</sup> of its report, in which its observations on the application of ratified Conventions are published. In this respect, the Committee recalls that its task consists of pointing out discrepancies with the requirements of Conventions, as well as underlining progress in their application. It considers that the publicity given to cases of satisfaction in the observations published in the Committee's report is an important means of encouraging member States to pursue their efforts to improve the application of ratified Conventions. Finally, with respect to the overall assessment of compliance with a particular Convention, the Committee notes the information provided by the secretariat on the work undertaken to assess progress towards the full application of fundamental principles and rights at work. The Committee notes that a pilot project has been undertaken by the Office to construct a methodology for the measurement of progress towards the application of Conventions Nos 87 and 98, taking the Committee's comments fully into account.

10. With respect to its practice when expressing its views on the meaning of certain provisions of Conventions, the Committee recalls the following elements, which are of particular relevance. In accordance with the

<sup>3</sup> See General Report, 76th Session (November–December 2005), paras 6–8; General Report, 77th Session (November–December 2006), para. 13.

<sup>4</sup> See General Report, 78th Session (November–December 2007), paras 7–8; General Report, 79th Session (November–December 2008), paras 8–9; General Report, 80th Session (November–December 2009), paras 7–8.

<sup>5</sup> Twenty-eight general observations were published in the Committee's reports from 2000 to 2010. Their breakdown is as follows: (i) nine observations concerning fundamental Conventions (Nos 29, 87, 100, 111, 138, 182); (ii) seven observations concerning governance Conventions (Nos 81, 122, 129); (iii) ten observations concerning technical Conventions (Nos 27, 63, 68, 73, 102, 135, 158, 159, 169); (iv) two observations related to the topics of wages and seafarers.

This year, the Committee formulated two general observations, one on the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) and one on the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169). These are published in Part II of its report as an introduction to the individual examination of the reports due on the application of the Conventions concerned.

<sup>6</sup> Under article 22 of the ILO Constitution, the Governing Body approves a report form for each Convention. For further information, see para. 36 of the Handbook of procedures relating to international labour Conventions and Recommendations, Geneva, Rev., 2006. All report forms are available on the ILO website, under the following link: <http://www.ilo.org/ilolex/english/reportforms/reportformsE.htm>.

mandate given to it by the Governing Body,<sup>9</sup> its task consists of evaluating national law and practice in relation to the requirements of international labour Conventions. It emphasizes in this respect the importance of the principles consistently followed by the Governing Body in appointing members of the Committee. They are appointed in a personal capacity and are selected on the basis of their independent standing, impartiality and competence. The members are drawn from all parts of the world and possess first-hand experience of different legal, economic and social systems. The Committee remains conscious of the fact that its work can have value only to the extent that it remains true to its principles of independence, objectivity and impartiality. Further, the Committee has always considered that its task is carried out in the context of an ongoing dialogue with governments, enhanced by the contribution of the employers' and workers' organizations.

11. Against this background, the Committee reiterates the functional approach that it has followed with regard to its role when examining the meaning of the provisions of Conventions. Although the Committee's mandate does not require it to give definitive interpretations of Conventions, it has to consider and express its views on the legal scope and meaning of certain provisions of these Conventions, where appropriate, in order to fulfil the mandate with which it has been entrusted of supervising the application of ratified Conventions. The examination of the meaning of the provisions of Conventions is necessarily an integral part of the function of evaluating and assessing the application and implementation of Conventions. The application of Conventions being the Committee's mandate, the Governing Body has therefore chosen to ensure that the Committee is composed of persons who are capable of fulfilling such mandate. The Committee ensures that the understanding of the provisions remains constant and uniform so that all member States may be guided in fulfilling their obligations arising from ratification of a Convention.

12. In responding to the request to clarify the methods followed when expressing its views on the meaning of the provisions of Conventions, the Committee reiterates that it constantly and consistently bears in mind all the different methods of interpreting treaties recognized under international public law, and in particular under the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, 1969. In particular, the Committee has always paid due regard to the textual meaning of the words in light of the Convention's purpose and object as provided for by Article 31 of the Vienna Convention, giving equal consideration to the two authentic languages of ILO Conventions, namely the English and French versions (Article 33 of the Vienna Convention). In addition and in accordance with Articles 5 and 32 of the Vienna Convention, the Committee takes into account the Organization's practice of examining the preparatory work leading to the adoption of the Convention. This is especially important for ILO Conventions in view of the tripartite nature of the Organization and the role that the tripartite constituents play in standard setting.<sup>10</sup>

13. In examining these matters, the Committee has borne in mind the comments made on the desirability of greater tripartite involvement in the supervision of the application of international labour Conventions. In keeping with the spirit of mutual respect, cooperation and responsibility which prevails in the Committee's relations with the International Labour Conference and its Committee on the Application of Standards, the Committee engages in a process of continuous improvement of its methods of work consequent to the comments of the Conference Committee, and, where appropriate, refers to the Conference Committee's report in its observations and direct requests. The Committee considers that it would be in the interests of both Committees to further strengthen this relationship, by creating opportunities for an additional and more in-depth exchange of views on matters of common interest. It invites the Office to examine the possibilities for that purpose. It notes in this respect that the importance of reinforcing the complementary relationship between the two Committees was also discussed during its special sitting with the two Vice-Chairpersons of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards.

Relations with the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards

14. As it has just emphasized, a spirit of mutual respect, cooperation and responsibility has consistently prevailed in the Committee's relations with the International Labour Conference and its Committee on the Application of Standards. The Committee of Experts takes the proceedings of the Conference Committee into full consideration, not only in respect of general matters concerning standard-setting activities and supervisory procedures, but also in particular with regard to specific matters concerning the way in which States fulfil their standards-related obligations. Moreover, the Committee pays close attention to the comments on its working methods that are made by the members of the Committee on the Application of Standards and the Governing Body, which it normally considers through its subcommittee, as it has done this year.

15. In this context, the Committee again welcomed the participation of Ms Bellace as an observer in the general discussion of the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 99th Session of the International Labour Conference <sup>9</sup> The Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee were established in 1926 under the same resolution by the International Labour Conference (see Appendix VII, proceedings of the Eighth Session of the International Labour Conference, 1926, Vol. 1). The Committee of Experts' terms of reference were extended by the Governing Body in 1947 (see Minutes of the 103rd Session of the Governing Body (1947), Appendix XII, para. 37).

<sup>10</sup> An example of this approach can be found in the Committee's general observation on the application of Convention No. 169 which appears in Part II of the present report.

(June 2010). It noted the decision by the Conference Committee to request the Director-General to renew this invitation for the 100th Session (June 2011) of the Conference. The Committee of Experts accepted this invitation.

16. The Chairperson of the Committee of Experts once again invited the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons of the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 99th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2010) (Mr Edward Potter and Mr Luc Cortebeek, respectively) to participate in a special sitting of the Committee at its present session. They both accepted this invitation.

17. A thorough exchange of views took place on matters of mutual interest. The discussion emphasized the importance of reinforcing the complementary relationship between the two Committees, in the interest of the effective application of international labour Conventions by member States. In line with the spirit of mutual respect governing the relationship between the two Committees, the discussion referred to possible improvements in the way that consideration is given by each Committee to the views expressed by the other Committee, including how such consideration is reflected in their respective work. In particular, the discussion touched upon the appropriate manner in which members of the Conference Committee could express their views on general issues of substance arising out of the application of international labour standards, so as to give ample opportunity to the Committee of Experts to consider their views closely and enhance the dialogue between the two Committees. Reference was also made to the possibility of creating additional opportunities for a direct exchange of views between the two Committees. Further, the special sitting discussed the lessons learnt from the General Survey concerning employment instruments and the related discussion by the Conference Committee at the 99th Session of the International Labour Conference. For the first time, these were both carried out within the framework of the follow-up to the Social Justice Declaration. In this context, questions were raised by both Committees as to the possibility of preserving effectively the value of General Surveys as authoritative documents providing guidance to member States in the application of international labour standards. Particular reference was made in this respect to the forthcoming General Survey on fundamental principles and rights at work, which was to cover all eight fundamental Conventions. It was also pointed out that arrangements should be made to allow for greater impact of General Surveys and their discussion by the Conference Committee on the conclusions of the recurrent discussions<sup>11</sup> at the International Labour Conference.

II. Compliance with obligations

Follow-up to cases of serious failure by member States to fulfil reporting and other standards-related obligations mentioned in the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards

18. The Committee recalls that, at the instigation of the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 93rd Session (June 2005) of the International Labour Conference, the two Committees, with the assistance of the Office, strengthened the follow-up given to cases of serious failure by member States to fulfil reporting and other standards-related obligations with a view to identifying more accurately the difficulties underlying these failures and helping the countries concerned to identify appropriate solutions to resolve them. As both Committees have recalled on numerous occasions, such failures hinder the functioning of the supervisory system, which is based primarily on the information provided by governments in their reports. Cases of failure to fulfil reporting obligations therefore have to be given the same level of attention as those relating to the application of ratified Conventions. The Committee also recalls that an assessment of the strengthened follow-up in cases of serious failure to comply with reporting obligations was submitted to the Governing Body at its 306th Session (November 2009).<sup>1</sup> The assessment emphasized that the systematic and strengthened technical assistance provided in the context of the follow-up on the basis of the comments of the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee has had a significant impact on the submission of reports.

19. The Committee notes that, during the general discussion of the Conference Committee at the 99th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2010) and the special sitting in which it examines these cases of serious failure, several members of the Conference Committee emphasized this positive impact. The Office was invited to continue and intensify technical assistance activities, and particularly to continue identifying the difficulties encountered by member States in compliance with their obligations with a view to resolving them. In the view of certain members, it is also necessary to continue the efforts made to lighten the workload relating to the submission of reports. They also emphasized that, in addition to causes that have their roots at the national level,<sup>2</sup> cases of failure to comply with reporting obligations are related to the workload of governments in sending reports, which illustrates, on the one hand, the need for countries to evaluate their capacity to implement Conventions and to submit the corresponding reports before considering their ratification and, on the other, the need to continue the integration and simplification of ILO Conventions by focusing on essential rules. Finally, the Committee notes that certain members of the Conference Committee once again emphasized that it is essential to provide high-quality information, and that cases of failure to reply to the comments of the Committee of Experts should be addressed more effectively. Other members also expressed concern at the number of reports that arrive late.

20. The Committee was informed that, pursuant to the discussions of the Conference Committee, the Office had sent special letters to the 39 member States mentioned in the relevant paragraphs of the report of the Conference Committee concerning their failure to fulfil their obligations respecting the sending of reports (there were 44 such member States in 2009, 55 in 2008, 45 in 2007, 49 in 2006 and 53 in 2005). The Committee notes that 38 of these 39 member States had already been mentioned for the same failures in the 2008 and 2009 reports of the Conference Committee (and even, in some cases, in earlier reports).

21. The Committee welcomes the fact that five countries which had experienced persistent difficulties and which as such had been mentioned in several reports of both Committees have this year fulfilled all their constitutional obligations in terms of the submission of reports and information due on the application of ratified Conventions.<sup>3</sup> The Committee notes that since the end of the session of the Conference, certain other member States, often with the assistance of the Office, have fulfilled part of their reporting and other standards-related obligations.<sup>4</sup>

22. This year, the Committee has made general observations<sup>5</sup> respecting compliance with obligations relating to reporting and the provision of the information due on ratified Conventions for 16 of the 39 countries referred to above. Most of these countries have not submitted any report on ratified Conventions for at least the last two years. In seven cases,<sup>6</sup> the Committee expressed deep concern at the number of reports due and the persistence of serious failure to comply with reporting and other standards-related obligations. These cases are priorities for the provision of technical assistance by the Office, even where such assistance cannot be provided immediately in view of the broader difficulties experienced by the countries concerned, of which the failure to submit reports is only one symptom. The Committee invites the Office to examine appropriate and realistic ways of enabling each country concerned to recommence the sending of reports, including measures, where possible, for the combination of reports on Conventions covering the same subject, with a view to simplifying and therefore accelerating their preparation and communication.

23. This year, as indicated below,<sup>7</sup> the Committee notes a worrying increase in the number of comments to which replies have not been received. Moreover, a certain number of countries, which had in the past overcome their difficulties, as the Committee noted in previous reports, are once again experiencing delays in the sending of reports. The Committee also invites the Office to contact these countries to help them identify more sustainable solutions, including in the context of technical cooperation programmes which specifically cover the need for the strengthening of capacities to prepare and send reports.

24. With regard to the reasons for the difficulties experienced by certain member States in fulfilling their reporting obligations, the information available this year (discussion of the Conference Committee, government replies to the Office's letters and information from external offices) confirms yet again that reporting failures are mostly of an institutional nature and, more specifically, the inadequacy of infrastructure, which can be attributed to the lack of human and financial resources affecting ministries of labour and labour administrations in general. The Committee notes that the challenges and perspectives of labour administration were discussed by the Governing Body at its 309th Session (November 2010), based on a paper prepared by the Office,<sup>8</sup> to prepare for the general discussion that will be held on this topic at the 100th Session (June 2011) of the International Labour Conference.

25. In these circumstances, the Committee emphasizes that the measures taken by the Office in the context of the strengthened follow-up, in addition to raising the awareness of the countries concerned with regard to the need to send the reports due, need to focus more on the durability and quality of reporting and the information provided by governments.<sup>9</sup> In view of the constant increase in the number of comments received from employers' and workers' organizations, this would provide the two Committees with full information as a basis for analysing the application of ratified Conventions.

26. The Committee reminds governments that they are required to comply with all the reporting and other standards-related obligations that they have accepted by becoming Members of the ILO. Compliance with these obligations is essential for dialogue between the supervisory bodies and member States on the effective implementation of ratified Conventions. Governments that request technical assistance may benefit from it, yet such assistance can only be useful and adapted to national circumstances if governments inform the Office of their specific difficulties and have the will to adopt lasting solutions. The Committee hopes that the Office will maintain the sustained technical assistance that it has been providing to member States as this is clearly an essential means for overcoming reporting difficulties effectively. Finally, the Committee welcomes the fruitful collaboration that it maintains with the Conference Committee on this matter of mutual interest, which is essential to the proper discharge of their respective tasks.

A. Reports on ratified Conventions (articles 22 and 35 of the Constitution)

27. The Committee's principal task consists of the examination of the reports supplied by governments on Conventions that have been ratified by member States and that have been declared applicable to non-metropolitan territories.

Reporting arrangements

28. Reports are requested every two years for the fundamental Conventions and Conventions considered to be most significant from the viewpoint of governance (the governance Conventions),<sup>10</sup> and every five years for other Conventions. In accordance with the procedure adopted by the Governing Body in November 2001 and March 2002,<sup>11</sup> particularly with a view to facilitating the collection of information on related subjects at the national level, requests for reports on Conventions covering the same subject are grouped together and addressed simultaneously to each country.<sup>12</sup> Finally, specific arrangements have been established for the fundamental and governance Conventions, as well as for certain other groups of Conventions containing a large number of instruments. For these Conventions, reports are requested, with a view to balancing their submission, in accordance with the English alphabetical order, the first year by member States beginning with the letters A to J, and the second year by those names beginning with the letters K to Z, or the converse<sup>13</sup> (for a list of Conventions grouped by subject, see page v).

29. The Committee recalls that at its 306th Session (November 2009), the Governing Body decided to increase from two to three years the reporting cycle for the fundamental and governance Conventions and to maintain the cycle at five years for the other Conventions. The Governing Body also discussed the evaluation of the grouping of Conventions by subject for reporting purposes.<sup>14</sup> The evaluation found that the grouping by subject had reduced the administrative burden of reporting and improved the collection of information at the national level, and had also allowed for a comprehensive view of the application of Conventions by subject area. The Committee notes that at the same session the Governing Body decided to adopt a broader grouping of Conventions for reporting purposes. This grouping will be established on the basis of the four strategic objectives of the ILO, as set out in the Social Justice Declaration: employment, social protection, social dialogue and tripartism, and fundamental principles and rights at work. The Committee notes that the idea behind this grouping of Conventions is to: (i) facilitate the choice of instruments to be examined in the context of General Surveys and, to a certain extent, facilitate the use in the preparation of General Surveys of the information on the application of ratified Conventions contained in the reports submitted under article 22 of the Constitution; and (ii) encourage, through the contribution of the General Survey to the recurrent discussion,<sup>15</sup> an improvement in the integration of international labour standards throughout ILO activities. The Committee notes that at its 309th Session (November 2010), the Governing Body examined a specific proposal for the grouping of standards by strategic objective. The Committee notes that arrangements are currently being made to give effect to all of these decisions of the Governing Body, but that the new reporting arrangements are not expected to enter into operation before 2012. Until that time, the reporting arrangements will continue to operate under the arrangements currently in force.

30. In addition to the reports requested according to the reporting cycle, the Committee also had before it reports especially requested from certain governments for one of the following reasons:

- (a) a first detailed report was due after ratification;
- (b) important discrepancies had previously been noted between national law or practice and the Conventions in question;
- (c) reports due for the previous period had not been received or did not contain the information requested;
- (d) reports were expressly requested by the Conference Committee.

The Committee also had before it a number of reports that it was unable to examine at its previous session.

31. In some cases, reports are not accompanied by copies of the relevant legislation, statistical data or other documentation necessary for their full examination. In cases where this material was not otherwise available, the Office, as requested by the Committee, has written to the governments concerned asking them to supply the necessary texts to enable the Committee to fulfil fully its task.

32. Appendix I to this report lists the reports received and not received, classified by country/territory and by Convention. Appendix II shows, for each year in which the Conference has met since 1932, the number and percentage of reports received by the prescribed date, by the date of the meeting of the Committee of Experts and by the date of the session of the International Labour Conference.

Reports requested and received

33. This year a total of 2,990 reports (under articles 22 and 35 of the Constitution) were requested from governments on the application of Conventions ratified by member States, compared to 3,121 reports last year. At the end of the present session of the Committee, 2,002 reports had been received by the Office. This figure corresponds to 66.95 per cent of the reports requested. Last year, the Office received a total of 2,053 reports, representing 65.78 per cent.

34. In accordance with article 22 of the Constitution, 2,745 reports were requested from governments. Of these, 1,866 had been received by the Office by the end of the present session of the Committee. This figure corresponds to 67.98 per cent of the reports requested (compared to 68 per cent last year). The Committee wishes to express its gratitude to the 81 member States, which have submitted all the reports due this year.

35. In accordance with article 35 of the Constitution, 245 reports were requested on Conventions declared applicable with or without modifications to non-metropolitan territories. Of these, 136 reports, or 55.51 per cent, had been received by the end of the Committee's session (compared to 52 per cent last year).

Compliance with reporting obligations<sup>16</sup>

36. Most of the governments from which reports were due on the application of ratified Conventions have supplied most or all of the reports requested (see Appendix I of this report). However, no reports due have been received for the past two or more years from the following 12 countries: Congo, Djibouti, Equatorial Guinea, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Uganda, United Kingdom (British Virgin Islands), United Kingdom (Falkland Islands (Malvinas)), United Kingdom (St Helena) and Vanuatu. The Committee examines compliance by each of these countries with their reporting obligations in the observations contained at the beginning of Part II (section I) of this report.

37. The Committee urges the governments of these countries to make every effort to supply the reports requested on ratified Conventions. As it emphasized in paragraph 24, the Committee is aware that where no reports have been sent for some time, it is likely that administrative or other problems are at the origin of the difficulties encountered by governments in fulfilling their constitutional obligations. In certain exceptional cases, the absence of reports is a result of more general difficulties related to the national situation, which often prevents the provision of any technical assistance by the Office. In such cases, it is important for governments to request assistance from the Office as soon as possible and for such assistance to be provided rapidly.

Late reports

38. The reports due on ratified Conventions should be sent to the Office between 1 June and 1 September of each year. Due consideration is given, when setting this date, to the time required to translate the reports and, where necessary, to conduct research into legislation and review other documents that are relevant to the examination of reports.

39. The Committee observes that by 1 September 2010 the proportion of reports received was 31.4 per cent, compared with 24.9 per cent at its previous session. The number of reports received on time this year has once again risen above 30 per cent, as it did in 2007 and 2008, following a significant decrease last year. The Committee is particularly grateful to the 30 countries which provided all the reports due within the time-limits with the information requested.<sup>17</sup> It notes that the request it made last year to member States to make a particular effort to ensure that their reports were submitted in time this year has had a certain effect. Nevertheless, the Committee is bound to emphasize once again that the number of reports received on time remains low. A significant number of reports are received after 1 September, during a very short period, thereby disturbing the sound operation of the regular supervisory procedure.

40. Furthermore, the Committee notes that a number of countries sent some or all of the reports due by 1 September 2009 during the period between the end of the Committee's last session (November–December 2009) and the beginning of the 99th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2010), or even during the <sup>16</sup> In general, the Committee makes observations in the most serious and persistent cases of failure by member States to respect their reporting and other standards-related obligations based on the following criteria: the failure to send reports for two or more years, the failure to supply first reports for two or more years, and the absence of an indication in the reports received (or in the majority of them) for three consecutive years of the representative employers' and workers' organizations to which copies of the reports and information are to be communicated. The Committee makes a direct request when a country has not sent the reports due, or the majority of reports due, in the current year.

<sup>17</sup> Afghanistan, Australia (Norfolk Island), Austria, Azerbaijan, Bahrain, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Cameroon, Cape Verde, China, China (Hong Kong Special Administrative Region), China (Macao Special Administrative Region), Colombia, Cuba, Eritrea, Georgia, Honduras, Jordan, Kuwait, Latvia, Malaysia (Peninsular Malaysia), Malaysia (Sabah), Malaysia (Sarawak), Myanmar, Netherlands, Nicaragua, Paraguay, Philippines, Poland, Republic of Moldova, Spain, Suriname, Turkmenistan, United Kingdom (Montserrat) and Uruguay.

Conference.<sup>18</sup> The Committee emphasizes that this practice also disturbs the regular operation of the supervisory system and makes it more burdensome. As requested by the Conference Committee, the Committee notes that the countries which followed this practice over the indicated period are the following: Afghanistan, Algeria, Armenia, Belgium, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Cambodia, Cape Verde, Croatia, Czech Republic, Denmark, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Hungary, Iceland, Islamic Republic of Iran, Italy, Kenya, Kiribati, Lesotho, Liberia, Malawi, Malta, Norway, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, San Marino, Sao Tomé and Príncipe, Senegal, Slovakia, Thailand, Togo, Tunisia, Turkey, Turkmenistan, United Kingdom (Gibraltar) and Zimbabwe.

41. In view of the high number of reports this year which do not include information in reply to its comments, the Committee requests all member States to pursue and strengthen their efforts with a view to ensuring that next year a larger number of reports are submitted within the time-limits and with all the required information. The Committee also requests the Office to intensify its technical assistance for this purpose. Finally, in line with the comments of the Conference Committee, the Committee hopes that the measures to streamline the sending and processing of information and reports, including the grouping of Conventions by strategic objective for reporting purposes and the lengthening of the reporting cycle for fundamental and governance Conventions, will facilitate the preparation and sending of reports by member States.

Supply of first reports

42. The Committee notes that 76 of the 130 first reports due on the application of ratified Conventions were received by the time the Committee's session ended, compared to last year when 52 of the 103 first reports due had been received. However, a number of countries have failed to supply first reports, some of which are more than a year overdue. Thus, certain first reports on ratified Conventions have not been received for a number of years from the following seven member States:

- Dominica
  - since 2006: Convention No. 147;
- Equatorial Guinea
  - since 1998: Conventions Nos 68, 92;
- Kyrgyzstan
  - since 1994: Convention No. 111;
  - since 2006: Conventions Nos 17, 184;
  - since 2009: Conventions Nos 131, 144
- Sao Tome and Principe
  - since 2007: Convention No. 184;
- Seychelles
  - since 2007: Conventions Nos 73, 147, 161, 180;
- Thailand
  - since 2009: Convention No. 159;
- Vanuatu
  - since 2008: Conventions Nos 29, 87, 98, 100, 105, 111, 182.

43. The failure of these countries to send the first reports due is raised in observations at the beginning of Part II (section I) of the present report. In general, the Committee, like the Conference Committee, emphasizes the particular importance of first reports, which provide the basis on which the Committee makes its initial assessment of the application of the specific Conventions concerned and, in certain cases, of all the Conventions ratified by the country. The Committee urges the governments concerned to make a special effort to supply the first reports due. The Committee also requests the Office to provide appropriate technical assistance, particularly since first reports are detailed reports and as such need to be prepared in light of the report form approved by the Governing Body for each Convention.<sup>19</sup>

Replies to the comments of the supervisory bodies

44. Governments are requested to reply in their reports to the observations and direct requests made by the Committee, and the majority of governments have provided the replies requested. In accordance with the established

<sup>18</sup> For the reports received and not received by the end of the Conference, see Report of the Committee on the Application of Standards, Part Two, II, Appendix I (Provisional Record No. 16, 99th Session, ILC, 2010). See also information on article 22 reports requested and received on the ILO website: <http://webfusion.ilo.org/public/db/standards/normes/appl/index.cfm>.

<sup>19</sup> Detailed reports have to be drawn up in accordance with the report form approved by the Governing Body for each Convention. Detailed reports are requested in the year following the entry into force of a Convention or when the Committee of Experts or the Conference Committee specifically requests such a report. Simplified reports are then requested on a regular basis. See the Governing Body's decisions in this respect (GB.282/LILS/5 (November 2001) and GB.283/LILS/6 (March 2002)).

practice, the Office has written to all the governments which failed to provide such replies requesting them to supply the necessary information. This year, only two of the governments which were contacted by the Office have provided the information requested.

45. This year, there were 669 cases in which no reply was received to comments (concerning 51 countries).<sup>20</sup> There were 695 such cases (concerning 48 countries) last year. The Committee has made observations to 15 of the countries concerned on compliance with their reporting and other standards-related obligations. These cases of comments to which replies have not been received may be classified as follows:

- (a) no reply has been received to all the reports requested from governments; or
- (b) the reports received contained no reply to most of the Committee's comments (observations and/or direct requests), and/or did not reply to the letters sent by the Office.

46. The Committee notes with deep concern that the number of comments to which replies have not been received has increased significantly over the past two years. This increase has led the Conference Committee and the Committee, with the support of the Office, to pay more sustained attention to cases of failure to comply with the obligation to provide information in reply to the Committee's comments. Moreover, the Committee recalls that, for the past five years, with a view to helping the countries to provide the required information, it has made the requests addressed to them in this respect more visible in its comments. The Committee underlines that the value attached by ILO constituents to the dialogue with the supervisory bodies on the application of ratified Conventions is considerably diminished by the failure of governments to fulfil their obligations in this respect. The Committee urges the countries concerned to provide all the information due and to have recourse to the assistance of the Office where necessary. In this respect, it requests the Office to give the highest priority to reinforcing the measures already taken and to the provision of specific assistance to the countries concerned so that they can provide the information requested on the application of ratified Conventions.

B. Examination by the Committee of Experts of reports on ratified Conventions

47. In examining the reports received on ratified Conventions and Conventions declared applicable to non-metropolitan territories, in accordance with its normal practice, the Committee assigned to each of its members the initial responsibility for a group of Conventions. Reports received early enough are sent to the members concerned in advance of the Committee's session. The members submit their preliminary conclusions on the instruments for which they are responsible to the Committee in plenary sitting for discussion and approval. Decisions on comments are adopted by consensus.

Observations and direct requests

48. In certain cases, the Committee has found that no comment is called for regarding the manner in which a ratified Convention has been implemented.<sup>21</sup> In other cases, however, the Committee has found it necessary to draw the attention of the governments concerned to the need to take further action to give effect to certain provisions of Conventions or to supply additional information on given points. As in previous years, its comments have been drawn up in the form of either “observations”, which are reproduced in the report of the Committee, or “direct requests”, which are not published in the Committee’s report, but are communicated directly to the governments concerned.<sup>22</sup>

49. The Committee’s observations appear in Part II of this report, together with a list under each Convention of any direct requests. An index of all observations and direct requests, classified by country, is provided in Appendix VII to the report.

Follow-up of procedures for the examination of representations under article 24 of the Constitution and complaints under article 26 of the Constitution

50. In accordance with the established practice, the Committee examines the measures taken by governments pursuant to the recommendations of tripartite committees (established to examine representations under article 24 of the Constitution) and commissions of inquiry (established to examine complaints under article 26 of the Constitution), after they have been approved (tripartite committees) or noted (commissions of inquiry) by the Governing Body. The corresponding information is examined by the Committee and forms an integral part of its dialogue with the governments concerned in the context of the examination of the reports submitted on the application of the respective Conventions, as well as any comments submitted by employers’ and workers’ organizations. The Committee considers it useful to indicate more clearly the cases in which it follows up on the effect given to the recommendations made under other constitutional supervisory procedures, as indicated in the following table.

Special notes

51. As in the past, the Committee has indicated by special notes at the end of the observations (traditionally known as footnotes) the cases in which, because of the nature of the problems encountered in the application of the Conventions

Observations and direct requests are accessible through the ILOLEX database, which is available on CD-ROM and accessible via <http://www.ilo.org/ilolex/english/index.htm>.

<sup>23</sup> “The Committee recalls that, when taking note of the report of the Commission of Inquiry, the Governing Body decided to refer the follow-up of the Commission’s recommendations to the Committee on Freedom of Association, while observing that the Committee of Experts would continue to examine the legislative aspects involved in respect of Conventions Nos 87 and 98.”

concerned, it has seemed appropriate to ask the government to supply a report earlier than would otherwise have been the case and, in some instances, to supply full particulars to the Conference at its next session in June 2011.

52. In order to identify cases for which it inserts special notes, the Committee uses the basic criteria described below, while taking into account the following general considerations. First, the criteria are indicative. In exercising its discretion in the application of the criteria, the Committee may also have regard to the specific circumstances of the country and the length of the reporting cycle. Second, the criteria are applicable to cases in which an earlier report is requested, often referred to as a “single footnote”, as well as to cases in which the government is requested to provide detailed information to the Conference, often referred to as a “double footnote”. The difference between these two categories is one of degree. Third, a serious case otherwise justifying a special note to provide full particulars to the Conference (double footnote) might only be given a special note to provide an early report (single footnote) when there has been a recent discussion of the case in the Conference Committee. Finally, the Committee wishes to point out that it exercises restraint in its recourse to “double footnotes” in deference to the Conference Committee’s decisions as to the cases it wishes to discuss.

53. The criteria to which the Committee has regard are the following:

- the seriousness of the problem; in this respect, the Committee emphasizes that an important consideration is the necessity to view the problem in the context of a particular Convention and to take into account matters involving fundamental rights, workers’ health, safety and well-being, as well as any adverse impact, including at the international level, on workers and other categories of protected persons;
- the persistence of the problem;
- the urgency of the situation; the evaluation of such urgency is necessarily case-specific, according to standard human rights criteria, such as life-threatening situations or problems where irreversible harm is foreseeable; and
- the quality and scope of the government’s response in its reports or the absence of response to the issues raised by the Committee, including cases of clear and repeated refusal on the part of a State to comply with its obligations.

54. At its 76th Session (November–December 2005), the Committee decided that the identification of cases in respect of which a government is requested to provide detailed information to the Conference would be a two-stage process: first, the expert initially responsible for a particular group of Conventions recommends to the Committee the insertion of special notes; second, in light of all the recommendations made, the Committee will, after discussion, take a final, collegial decision once it has reviewed the application of all the Conventions.

55. This year, under the present reporting cycle the Committee has requested early reports after an interval of either one, two or three years, according to the circumstances, in the following cases:

Practical application

58. It is customary for the Committee to note the information contained in governments' reports allowing it to assess the application of Conventions in practice, such as information relating to judicial decisions, statistics and labour inspection. The supply of this information is requested in almost all report forms, as well as under the specific terms of some Conventions.

59. The Committee notes that 413 reports received this year contain information on the practical application of Conventions. Of these, 44 reports contain information on national jurisprudence. The Committee also notes that 369 of the reports contain information on statistics and labour inspection.

60. The Committee wishes to emphasize to governments the importance of submitting such information, which is indispensable to complete the examination of national legislation and to help the Committee to identify the issues arising from real problems of application in practice. The Committee also wishes to encourage employers' and workers' organizations to submit clear and up to date information on the application of Conventions in practice.

Cases of progress

61. Following its examination of the reports supplied by governments, and in accordance with its standard practice, the Committee refers in its comments to cases in which it expresses its satisfaction or interest at the progress achieved in the application of the respective Conventions.

62. At its 80th Session (November–December 2009) and at its present session, the Committee made the following clarifications on the general approach developed over the years for the identification of cases of progress:

- (1) The expression by the Committee of interest or satisfaction does not mean that it considers that the country in question is in general conformity with the Convention, and in the same comment the Committee may express its satisfaction or interest at a specific issue while also expressing regret concerning other important matters which, in its view, have not been addressed in a satisfactory manner.
- (2) The Committee wishes to emphasize that an indication of progress is limited to a specific issue related to the application of the Convention and the nature of the measure adopted by the government concerned.
- (3) The Committee exercises its discretion in noting progress, taking into account the particular nature of the Convention and the specific circumstances of the country.
- (4) The expression of progress can refer to different kinds of measures relating to national legislation, policy or practice.
- (5) If the satisfaction or interest relates to the adoption of legislation or to a draft legislation, the Committee may also consider appropriate follow-up measures for its practical application.
- (6) In identifying cases of progress, the Committee takes into account both the information provided by governments in their reports and the comments of employers' and workers' organizations.

63. Since first identifying cases of satisfaction in its report in 1964,<sup>24</sup> the Committee has continued to follow the same general criteria. The Committee expresses satisfaction in cases in which, following comments it has made on a specific issue, governments have taken measures through either the adoption of new legislation, an amendment to the existing legislation or a significant change in the national policy or practice, thus achieving fuller compliance with their obligations under the respective Conventions. In expressing its satisfaction, the Committee indicates to governments and the social partners that it considers the specific matter resolved. The reason for identifying cases of satisfaction is twofold:

- to place on record the Committee’s appreciation of the positive action taken by governments in response to its comments; and
- to provide an example to other governments and social partners which have to address similar issues.

64. Details concerning these cases of progress are to be found in Part II of this report and cover 63 instances in which measures of this kind have been taken in 40 countries. The full list is as follows:

65. Thus the total number of cases in which the Committee has been led to express its satisfaction at the progress achieved following its comments has risen to 2,803 since the Committee began listing them in its report.

66. Within cases of progress, the distinction between cases of satisfaction and cases of interest was formalized in 1979.<sup>25</sup> In general, cases of interest cover measures that are sufficiently advanced to justify the expectation that further progress would be achieved in the future and regarding which the Committee would want to continue its dialogue with the government and the social partners. In comparison to cases of satisfaction, cases of interest relate to progress, which is less significant. The Committee's practice has developed to such an extent that cases in which it expresses interest may encompass a variety of measures. The paramount consideration is that the measures contribute to the overall achievement of the objectives of a particular Convention. This may include:

- draft legislation that is before parliament, or other proposed legislative changes forwarded or available to the Committee;
- consultations within the government and with the social partners;
- new policies;
- the development and implementation of activities within the framework of a technical cooperation project or following technical assistance or advice from the Office;
- judicial decisions, according to the level of the court, the subject matter and the force of such decisions in a particular legal system, would normally be considered as cases of interest unless there is a compelling reason to note a particular judicial decision as a case of satisfaction; or
- the Committee may also note as cases of interest the progress made by a State, province or territory in the framework of a federal system.

<sup>25</sup> See para. 122 of the report of the Committee of Experts submitted to the 65th Session (1979) of the International Labour Conference.

Cases of good practice

68. In accordance with the decision taken at its 78th Session (November–December 2007), the Committee highlights cases of good practice to express its appreciation of the special efforts made in applying a Convention, and so that they might where appropriate serve as a model for other countries to assist in the implementation of ratified Conventions and the furtherance of social progress. At its 79th Session (November–December 2008), the Committee agreed on the general criteria that it would apply to identify cases of good practice. The Committee further agreed that it would continue to follow a two-stage process for the identification of cases of good practice: first, the expert initially responsible for a particular group of Conventions recommends to the Committee that a measure or measures should be identified as a case of good practice; second, in light of all the recommendations made, the Committee will, after discussion, take a final collegial decision once it has reviewed the application of all the Conventions.<sup>26</sup>

69. At its 80th Session (November–December 2009), the Committee focused, in particular, on clarifying the distinction between cases of good practice and cases of progress. In this respect, the Committee wishes to underline at the outset that cases of good practice are necessarily also cases of progress, although the reverse is not always true. The Committee wishes to point out that the identification of a case of good practice does not in any way imply additional obligations for member States under the Conventions that they have ratified. Moreover, mere compliance with the requirements of a Convention is not sufficient for the identification of a case of good practice, as compliance is a basic requirement deriving from ratification of the Convention. Cases of good practice are therefore of an informative rather than of a prescriptive nature. Their identification forms part of the ongoing dialogue with the government concerned on the application of a ratified Convention and can relate to any measure taken in national legislation, policy or practice. A certain caution must clearly be exercised in the identification of cases of good practice so as to minimize the possibility that such practices may with hindsight come to be viewed as unsatisfactory.

70. Bearing in mind these aspects, the Committee wishes to confirm the following three criteria, which were identified at its 79th Session (November–December 2008), on the understanding that they are indicative, but not exhaustive.

- (1) A case of good practice may consist of a new approach to achieving or improving compliance with the Convention and could therefore be useful as a model for other countries in implementing that Convention.
- (2) The practice may reflect an innovative or creative way of either implementing the Convention, or of addressing difficulties which arise in its application.
- (3) Recognizing that Conventions lay down minimum standards, the practice may offer an example of a country extending the application or coverage of the Convention to enhance the achievement of its objectives, particularly in cases where the Convention contains flexibility clauses.

Cases in which the need for technical assistance has been highlighted

71. The combination of the work of the supervisory bodies and the practical guidance given to member States through technical cooperation and assistance has always been one of the key dimensions of the ILO supervisory system. Further, since 2005, at the initiative of the Conference Committee, heightened attention has been given to the complementarity between examination by the ILO supervisory bodies and the Office's technical assistance. As pointed out in paragraphs 18 to 26, this has led to enhanced follow-up of cases of serious failure by member States to fulfil reporting and other standards-related obligations. In addition, the Conference Committee has made more systematic references to technical assistance in its conclusions regarding individual cases concerning the application of ratified Conventions. The aim of this strengthened combination between the work of the supervisory bodies and the Office's technical assistance is to provide an effective framework to member States for full compliance with their standards-related obligations, including the implementation of the Conventions which they have ratified.

72. In this context, the Committee decided at its 79th Session (November–December 2008) to highlight the cases for which, in the Committee's view, technical assistance would be particularly useful in helping member States to address gaps in law and in practice in the implementation of ratified Conventions. These cases are highlighted in the following table and details can be found in Part II of the report of the Committee of Experts. The Committee also examined a certain number of cases in relation to which the Conference Committee emphasized the need for technical assistance at the last session of the Conference.<sup>27</sup>

Questions concerning the application of certain Conventions

73. A general observation appears as an introduction to the examination of individual reports due under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81). This general observation covers the obligation set out in the Convention for the publication and communication to the Office each year of an annual report on the work of the labour inspection services. It also encourages a widespread ratification of the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129).

74. A general observation appears as an introduction to the examination of individual reports due under the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169), covering the right to consultation as envisaged in the Convention.

Comments made by employers' and workers' organizations

75. At each session, the Committee draws the attention of governments to the important role of employers' and workers' organizations in the application of Conventions and Recommendations. Moreover, it highlights the fact that numerous Conventions require consultation with employers' and workers' organizations, or their collaboration in a variety of measures. The Committee notes that almost all governments have indicated in the reports supplied under articles 19 and 22 of the Constitution the representative organizations of employers and workers to which, in accordance with article 23, paragraph 2, of the Constitution, they have communicated copies of the reports supplied to the Office. The Committee however emphasizes that, for the second time in two years, it had to make an observation to one country which has omitted this indication for the third consecutive year in its reports on ratified Conventions.<sup>28</sup> The Committee recalls that, in accordance with the tripartite nature of the ILO, compliance with this constitutional obligation is intended to enable representative organizations of employers and workers to participate fully in supervision of the application of international labour standards. As recalled by the Chairperson of the Committee of Experts before the Conference Committee this year, if a government fails to comply with this obligation, these organizations are denied their opportunity to comment and an essential element of tripartism is lost. The Committee calls on all member States, with particular reference to the country referred to above, to discharge their obligation under article 23, paragraph 2, of the Constitution. The Committee also requests governments to provide copies of reports to representative employers' and workers' organizations so that they have enough time to send any comments that they may wish to make.

76. Since its last session, the Committee has received 794 comments (compared to 705 last year), 119 of which (compared to 115 last year) were communicated by employers' organizations and 675 (compared to 590 last year) by workers' organizations. The Committee recalls the importance it attaches to this contribution by employers' and workers' organizations to the work of the supervisory bodies. This contribution is essential for the Committee's evaluation of the application of ratified Conventions in national law and in practice.

77. The majority of the comments received (661) relate to the application of ratified Conventions (see Appendix III).<sup>29</sup> Some 358 of these comments relate to the application of fundamental Conventions, 68 relate to governance Conventions and 235 concern the application of other Conventions. Moreover, 133 comments concern reports provided under article 19 of the Constitution on the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), the Employment Promotion and Protection against Unemployment Convention, 1988 (No. 168), the Income Security Recommendation, 1944 (No. 67), and the Medical Care Recommendation, 1944 (No. 69).<sup>30</sup>

<sup>29</sup> An indication of the observations made by employers' and workers' organizations on the application of Conventions received during the current year is available on the ILO website: <http://webfusion.ilo.org/public/db/standards/normes/appl/index.cfm>.

78. The Committee notes that, of the comments received this year, 556 were transmitted directly to the Office which, in accordance with the practice established by the Committee, referred them to the governments concerned for comment. The Committee emphasizes that comments submitted by employers' and workers' organizations should be received by the Office by 1 September at the latest to allow governments to have a reasonable time to respond, thereby enabling the Committee to examine the issues in question at its session in November the same year. Comments received later than 1 September will be examined by the Committee at its session the following year. In 238 cases, the governments transmitted the comments made by employers' and workers' organizations with their reports, sometimes adding their own comments.

79. The Committee also examined a number of other comments by employers' and workers' organizations, consideration of which had been postponed from its previous session because the comments of the organizations or the replies of the governments had arrived just before, during or just after the session. It again had to postpone until its next session the examination of a number of comments when they were received too close to or even during the Committee's present session.

80. The Committee has paid particular attention to the comments made by the Single Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CUT), the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and Education International (EI) in relation to the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), in Colombia and which refer, inter alia, to longstanding issues of violence against trade unionists and a climate of impunity. Cognizant of the Government's invitation for a high-level tripartite mission to visit the country in February 2011, the Committee considers that it will be best placed to make a full evaluation of the application of the Convention when it has available to it the report of this upcoming mission, as well as the Government's detailed report on the application of the Convention, due next year, and its observations on the CUT, ITUC and EI comments. For these reasons, the Committee has decided to examine the application of this Convention, including the issues raised in these comments, at its next session in November–December 2011.

81. The Committee notes that in general the employers' and workers' organizations concerned endeavoured to gather and present elements of law and fact on the application in practice of ratified Conventions. The Committee recalls that it is essential for the organizations, when referring specifically to the Convention or Conventions deemed relevant, to provide detailed information that has real additional value with regard to the information provided by governments and the issues addressed in the Committee's comments. Such information should help to update or renew the analysis of the application of Conventions and emphasize real problems concerning their application in practice. The Committee invites the organizations interested to request technical assistance from the Office to this end.

Treatment of comments received from employers' and workers' organizations in a non-reporting year

82. The Committee recalls that at its 77th Session (November–December 2006), it gave guidance to the Office as to the procedure to be followed in determining the treatment of comments received from employers' and workers' organizations concerning the application of a ratified Convention in a non-reporting year. At its 80th Session (November–December 2009), the Committee examined this procedure in light of the decision by the Governing Body to extend the cycle for the submission of reports from two to three years for the fundamental and governance Conventions. In this respect, the Committee is fully aware of the need to apply in a fair and judicious manner the decisions taken by the Governing Body to extend the reporting cycle and to ensure that employers' and workers' organizations comments may effectively draw its attention to areas of concern, even when no report on the Convention in question is due from the government that year.

83. The Committee confirms that, where the comments received from employers' and workers' organizations simply repeat comments made in previous years, or refer to matters already raised by the Committee, they will be examined in accordance with the normal cycle in the year when the government's report is due, and a report will not be requested from the government outside that cycle. This procedure may also be followed in the case of comments which provide additional information on law and practice concerning matters already raised by the Committee, or on minor legislative changes, although consideration may be given, depending on the specific circumstances, to requesting an advanced report in such cases.

84. However, where the comment raises more serious allegations of important acts of non-compliance with a particular Convention – as opposed to mere repetitions – the government will be requested to reply to these allegations outside the normal reporting cycle and the Committee will consider the comments in the year in which they are received, where the allegations go beyond mere declarations. Comments referring to important legislative changes, or to proposals which have a fundamental impact on the application of a Convention will be considered in the same manner, as will comments which refer to minor, new legislative proposals or draft laws not yet examined by the Committee, where their early examination may assist the government at the drafting stage.

85. The Committee emphasizes that the procedure set out above aims at giving effect to decisions taken by the Governing Body which have both extended the reporting cycle and provided for safeguards in that context to ensure that effective supervision of the application of ratified Conventions is maintained. One of these safeguards consists in giving due recognition to the possibility afforded to employers' and workers' organizations to draw the attention of the Committee to matters of particular concern arising from the application of ratified Conventions, even in a year when no report is due; in such cases, comments received directly by the Office are communicated to the governments concerned in a timely fashion so as to ensure respect for due process. The Committee will continue to give full and careful consideration to all the elements made available to it in order to ensure the effective, up to date and regular monitoring of the application of ratified Conventions in the context of the new extended reporting cycle for the fundamental and governance Conventions.

86. Part II of this report contains most of the observations made by the Committee on cases in which the comments raised matters relating to the application of ratified Conventions. Where appropriate, other comments are examined in requests addressed directly to governments.

C. Submission of instruments adopted by the Conference to the competent authorities (article 19, paragraphs 5, 6 and 7, of the Constitution)

87. In accordance with its terms of reference, the Committee this year examined the following information supplied by the governments of member States pursuant to article 19 of the Constitution of the Organization:

- (a) additional information on measures taken to submit to the competent authorities the instruments adopted by the Conference from 1967 (51st Session) to June 2007 (96th Session) (Conventions Nos 128 to 188, Recommendations Nos 132 to 199 and Protocols);
- (b) Replies to the observations and direct requests made by the Committee at its 80th Session (November–December 2009).

88. Appendix IV of Part II of the report contains a summary indicating the competent authority to which the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 96th Session were submitted and the date of submission.

89. Other statistical information is to be found in Appendices V and VI of Part II of the report. Appendix V, compiled from information sent by governments, shows where each member State stands in terms of its constitutional obligation of submission. Appendix VI shows the overall submission status of instruments adopted since the 51st Session (June 1967) of the Conference. The statistical data in Appendices V and VI are regularly updated by the competent branches of the Office and can be accessed via the Internet.

90. The Committee points out that the International Labour Conference adopted no international labour Conventions or Recommendations at its 97th Session (June 2008) or its 98th Session (June 2009).

96th Session

91. At its 96th Session in May–June 2007, the Conference adopted the Work in Fishing Convention, 2007 (No. 188), and Recommendation, 2007 (No. 199). The 12 month period for submission to the competent authorities of Convention No. 188 and Recommendation No. 199 ended on 14 June 2008, and the 18-month period on 14 December 2008. In all, 71 governments out of the 178 member States have already submitted the instruments adopted at the 96th Session. At this session, the Committee examined new information on the steps taken regarding Convention No. 188 and Recommendation No. 189 by the following Governments: Argentina, Austria, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Costa Rica, Cuba, Gambia, Kenya, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Latvia, Paraguay, Portugal and Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela.

Cases of progress

92. The Committee notes with interest the information sent in the course of the period concerned by the governments of the following countries: Bosnia and Herzegovina, Gambia, Kenya, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Nepal, Paraguay, Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela and Zambia. It welcomes the efforts made by these governments to make up for the significant delay in submission and thus fulfil their obligation to submit to their parliamentary bodies the instruments adopted by the Conference over a number of years.

Special problems

93. To facilitate the work of the Committee on the Application of Standards, this report only mentions governments that have neither submitted to the competent authorities nor ratified instruments adopted by the Conference for at least the seven sessions held from 2001 (i.e. from the 89th Session to the 96th Session in 2007). This timeframe was deemed long enough to warrant inviting the governments concerned to a special sitting of the Conference Committee so that they could account for the delays in submission.

94. The Committee notes that at the closure of its 81st Session, on 10 December 2010, the following 37 countries are in the situation specified in paragraph 93: Antigua and Barbuda, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Belize, Cambodia, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chile, Comoros, Congo, Côte d'Ivoire, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Djibouti, Dominica, Equatorial Guinea, Georgia, Ghana, Guinea, Haiti, Ireland, Kiribati, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mozambique, Papua New Guinea, Rwanda, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Sudan, Tajikistan, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Turkmenistan, Uganda and Uzbekistan.

95. The Committee is constantly aware of the exceptional circumstances which have affected these countries for years and as a result of which some of them have been deprived of the institutions needed to fulfil the obligation to submit instruments. At the 99th Session of the Conference (June 2010), the Government representatives of 11 delegations supplied information explaining why their countries had been unable to meet the constitutional obligation to submit Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols to national parliaments. As the Committee of Experts had done before it, the Conference Committee expressed great concern at the failure to respect this obligation. It pointed out that compliance with this constitutional obligation, which means submitting the instruments adopted by the Conference to national parliaments, is of the utmost importance in ensuring the effectiveness of the Organization's standards-related activities.

96. The abovementioned countries have been identified in observations published in section III of Part II of this report and the Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols that have not been submitted are indicated in the statistical appendices. The Committee considers it worthwhile to alert the governments concerned so as to enable them immediately and as a matter of urgency to take appropriate steps to bring themselves up to date and allow them to benefit from the measures the Office will take to assist them in the steps required for the rapid submission to parliament of the pending instruments.

Comments of the Committee and replies from governments

97. As in its previous reports, the Committee makes individual observations in section III of Part Two of this report on the points that should be brought to the special attention of governments. Observations are made in cases where there has been no information for five or more sessions of the Conference. Furthermore, requests for additional information on other points have been addressed directly to a number of countries (see the list of direct requests at the end of section III).

98. The Committee hopes that the 75 observations and the 48 direct requests that it is addressing this year to governments will enable them better to discharge their constitutional obligation of submission, thereby contributing to the promotion of the standards adopted by the Conference.

99. As the Committee has already pointed out, it is important that governments send the information and documents required by the questionnaire at the end of the Memorandum adopted by the Governing Body in March 2005. The Committee must receive for examination a summary or a copy of the documents submitting the instruments to the parliamentary bodies and be informed of the proposals made as to the action to be taken on them. The obligation of submission is discharged only once the instruments adopted by the Conference have been submitted to parliament and the competent authorities have taken a decision on them. The Office has to be informed of this decision, as well as of the submission of instruments to parliament.

100. The Committee hopes to be able to note progress in this matter in its next report. It again reminds governments that they may seek technical assistance from the ILO, particularly through the standards specialists in the field.

D. Instruments chosen for reports under article 19 of the Constitution

101. The Committee recalls that at its 303rd Session (November 2008), the Governing Body decided to align the subjects of General Surveys with those of the annual recurrent discussions in the Conference under the follow-up to the Social Justice Declaration. This year, in accordance with the decision taken by the Governing Body at its 304th Session (March 2009),<sup>31</sup> governments were requested to supply reports under article 19 of the Constitution as a basis for the General Survey on the following instruments: the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), the Employment Promotion and Protection against Unemployment Convention, 1988 (No. 168), the Income Security Recommendation, 1944 (No. 67), and the Medical Care Recommendation, 1944 (No. 69).

102. A total of 681 reports were requested and 424 were received (compared to last year when 826 reports were requested and 460 were received). This represents 62.26 per cent of the reports requested. The Committee notes that the number of reports received under article 19 for the General Survey has increased significantly over the past two years. It welcomes this trend and also notes that the reports received this year contain in general the information requested.

103. The Committee notes with regret that, for the past five years, none of the reports on unratified Conventions and Recommendations requested under article 19 of the Constitution have been received from the following 25 countries: Cambodia, Cape Verde, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Equatorial Guinea, Georgia, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Ireland, Kyrgyzstan, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Luxembourg, Malta, Russian Federation, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Sierra Leone, Somalia, Tajikistan, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Timor-Leste, Togo, Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan, Vanuatu.

104. The Committee once again urges governments to provide the reports requested so that its General Surveys can be as comprehensive as possible. It hopes that the Office will supply all the necessary technical assistance to this end.

105. Part III of this report (issued separately as Report III (Part 1B)) contains the General Survey concerning social security instruments.<sup>32</sup> In accordance with the practice followed in previous years, the survey has been prepared on the basis of a preliminary examination by a working party comprising six members of the Committee.

III. Collaboration with other international organizations and functions relating to other international instruments

A. Cooperation in the field of standards with the United Nations

106. In the context of collaboration with other international organizations on questions concerning supervision of the application of international instruments relating to subjects of common interest, the United Nations, certain specialized agencies and other intergovernmental organizations with which the ILO has entered into special arrangements for this purpose are being asked to indicate whether they have information on how Conventions are being applied. The list of the Conventions concerned and the international organizations that were consulted is as follows:

- the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107): United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO), Inter-American Indian Institute of the Organization of American States, United Nations (UN), United Nations Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR), United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) and World Health Organization (WHO);
- the Radiation Protection Convention, 1960 (No. 115): International Atomic Energy Agency;
- the Social Policy (Basic Aims and Standards) Convention, 1962 (No. 117): FAO, UN, OHCHR and UNESCO;
- the Prevention of Accidents (Seafarers) Convention, 1970 (No. 134), and the Merchant Shipping (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 147): International Maritime Organization (IMO);
- the Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141): FAO, UN and OHCHR;
- the Human Resources Development Convention, 1975 (No. 142): UNESCO;
- the Migrant Workers (Supplementary Provisions) Convention, 1975 (No. 143): UN, OHCHR, UNESCO and WHO;
- the Nursing Personnel Convention, 1977 (No. 149): WHO;
- the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169): FAO, Inter-American Indian Institute of the Organization of American States, UN, OHCHR, UNESCO and WHO.

107. The Committee notes that at its Ninth Session in May 2010, the United Nations Permanent Forum on Indigenous Issues (UNPFII) addressed certain recommendations to the ILO with regard to Convention No. 169, and the supervision of its application, including specific reference to the work of the Committee of Experts.

108. The Committee also notes that, at its Fifteenth Session in September 2010, the Human Rights Council decided to appoint for a period of three years a special rapporteur on the rights to freedom of peaceful assembly and of association.<sup>1</sup> The Committee notes in particular that, in determining the mandate of the special rapporteur, the Human Rights Council was careful to indicate that the special rapporteur should undertake his or her activities such that his or her mandate will not include those matters of specific competence of the International Labour Organization and its specialized supervisory mechanisms and procedures with respect to employers' and workers' rights to freedom of association, with a view to avoiding any duplication. The resolution of the Human Rights Council specifies that the special rapporteur should work in coordination with other mechanisms of the Council, other competent United Nations bodies and human rights treaty bodies, and to take all necessary measures to avoid unnecessary duplication with those mechanisms.

B. United Nations treaties concerning human rights

109. The Committee recalls that international labour standards and the provisions of related United Nations human rights treaties are complementary and mutually reinforcing. It emphasizes that continuing cooperation between the ILO and the United Nations with regard to the application of relevant instruments is essential, particularly in the context of United Nations reforms aimed at greater coherence and cooperation within the United Nations system and the human rights-based approach to development.

110. The Committee welcomes the fact that the Office has continued to provide information on the application of international labour standards to the United Nations treaty bodies on a regular basis, in accordance with the existing arrangements between the ILO and the United Nations. It has also continued to follow the work of these bodies and to take their comments into consideration where appropriate. The Committee considers that coherent international monitoring is an important basis for action to enhance the enjoyment of and compliance with economic, social and cultural rights at the national level. The Committee itself had the opportunity to continue its collaboration with the United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights in the context of the annual meeting between the two Committees which took place on 25 November 2010, at the invitation of the Friedrich Ebert Stiftung. This year the topic selected for discussion was “Regression in the realization of social rights in light of current austerity measures”.

111. The Committee notes that the Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, adopted by the United Nations General Assembly on 10 December 2008, has obtained 35 signatures to date. The Committee considers it essential for its collaboration with the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights to be strengthened, especially when the Optional Protocol enters into force.

C. European Code of Social Security and its Protocol

112. In accordance with the supervisory procedure established under Article 74, paragraph 4, of the European Code of Social Security, and the arrangements made between the ILO and the Council of Europe, the Committee of Experts examined 21 reports on the application of the Code and, as appropriate, its Protocol. At the sitting in which the Committee examined the reports on the Code and its Protocol, the Council of Europe was represented by Ms Ana Gomez Heredero. The conclusions of the Committee regarding these reports will be sent to the Council of Europe for examination by its Committee of Experts on Social Security. Once approved, the Committee’s comments should lead to the adoption of resolutions by the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe on the application of the Code and the Protocol by the countries concerned.

113. With its dual responsibility for the application of the Code and for international labour Conventions relating to social security, the Committee is seeking to develop a coherent analysis of the application of European and international instruments and to coordinate the obligations of the States parties to these instruments. The Committee also draws attention to the national situations in which recourse to technical assistance from the Council of Europe and the Office may prove to be an effective means of improving the application of the Code.

114. Lastly, the Committee would like to express its appreciation for the invaluable assistance again rendered to it by the officials of the Office, whose competence and devotion to duty make it possible for the Committee to accomplish its increasingly voluminous and complex task in a limited period of time.

Part II. Observations concerning particular countries ****

---

* In accordance with the decision taken at its 81st Session (November–December 2010), the Committee recalls that it follows a specific approach in identifying in its comments cases of progress. This approach is described in paragraphs 61 to 67, Part I (General Report) of the present report. In particular, the Committee recalls that the identification of a case of progress does not mean that it considers the country in question to be in general conformity with the Convention. Further, an indication of progress is limited to a specific issue related to the application of the Convention and the nature of the measure adopted by the government concerned.

I. Observations concerning reports on ratified Conventions (articles 22, 23, paragraph 2, and 35, paragraphs 6 and 8, of the Constitution)

General observations

Congo

The Committee notes that, for the second consecutive year, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received and that 18 reports are now due (Conventions Nos 13, 14, 29, 81, 87, 89, 95, 98, 100, 105, 111, 119, 138, 144, 149, 150, 152 and 182), most of which should include information in reply to the Committee's comments. The Committee takes due note of the explanations provided by the Government representative to the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 99th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2010) indicating the need for the training of officials who have recently been made responsible for the preparation of reports following staff movements within the Ministry of Labour. The Committee hopes that the Office will be in a position to provide all appropriate technical assistance, as indicated in its letter of 16 July 2010 pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards, also in the context of the technical cooperation from which the Government has been benefiting for several years. It requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay for the submission of all the reports and information due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Djibouti

The Committee notes that, for the second consecutive year, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received. A total of 37 reports are now due (Conventions Nos 1, 9, 13, 16, 19, 22, 23, 26, 29, 38, 53, 55, 56, 63, 69, 71, 73, 81, 87, 88, 94, 95, 96, 98, 100, 101, 105, 106, 108, 111, 115, 120, 122, 124, 138, 144 and 182), most of which should include information in reply to the Committee's comments. As emphasized by the Office in its letter of 16 July 2010 pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 99th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2010), the Committee notes that, despite the efforts made in 2008 to resolve the difficulties encountered in the sending of reports, the Government is once again faced by a significant backlog in this respect. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay, including through the Office's technical assistance, with a view to identifying more long-term solutions and to submit the reports and information due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Dominica

The Committee notes that the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received and that nine reports are now due: a first report on Convention No. 147 (due since 2006) and eight other reports (Conventions Nos 16, 19, 29, 81, 95, 105, 138 and 182), most of which should include information in reply to the Committee's comments. It notes the efforts made by the Government in 2009 to submit the great majority of reports have not been followed up this year. In accordance with the indications in its letter of 15 July 2010 pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 99th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2010), the Office raised the issue of the preparation of reports in a mission carried out in July 2010, with emphasis on the importance of providing replies to the Committee's comments. In response to the difficulties related to the lack of personnel, as indicated by the Government, the Office reiterated its availability to supplement the support provided in 2009. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay, including requesting technical assistance from the Office with a view to identifying long-term solutions, and to submit the reports and information due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Equatorial Guinea

The Committee notes that, for the second consecutive year, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received and that 14 reports are now due: two first reports on Conventions Nos 68 and 92 (due since 1998) and 12 other reports (Conventions Nos 1, 14, 29, 30, 87, 98, 100, 103, 105, 111, 138 and 182), most of which should include information in reply to the Committee's comments. With the exception of one report submitted in 2008, the Government has not provided reports since 2006. The Committee therefore wishes to express its deep concern at this situation, which has continued despite the numerous initiatives taken by the Office to offer technical assistance, including through its letter of 16 July 2010 pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 99th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2010). The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures without delay, including by requesting technical assistance from the Office, with a view to the submission of the reports and information due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

France

Non-metropolitan territories

In its previous general observation, the Committee referred to a statement communicated by the Government in accordance with article 35 of the Constitution with regard to the status of the non-metropolitan territories and the Conventions declared applicable therein. So that the statement could be registered and take effect, the Government was invited to provide certain specifications relating to the territories which maintain the status of non-metropolitan territories within the meaning of the Constitution of the ILO. As the Government provided the necessary specifications, the statement was registered and took effect on 31 August 2009, the date of its receipt by the Director-General.

The Committee notes that as a result of the statement five territories, Guadeloupe, French Guiana, Martinique, Réunion and St Pierre and Miquelon, are no longer considered to be non-metropolitan territories within the meaning of the Constitution of the ILO. Accordingly, all the Conventions ratified by France are applicable to them and the reports provided under article 22 of the Constitution on the application of ratified Conventions are also considered to cover those territories. The Committee accordingly included the examination of the pending issues relating to these five territories in its examination of the reports submitted under article 22 of the Constitution. The Committee also notes that the Government specified that three territories, Clipperton Island, St Martin and St Barthélemy, the status of which in relation to the Constitution of the ILO had never been specified, are in the same legal situation as the five territories referred to above.

The Committee further notes that, under the terms of the statement submitted by France, three territories, New Caledonia, French Polynesia and the French Southern and Antarctic territories, retain the status of non-metropolitan territories within the meaning of article 35 of the Constitution. The Committee notes in this respect that, according to the information provided by the Government, the Conventions applicable therein remain unchanged. The Committee has decided to take up once again the examination of the reports concerning the Conventions declared applicable to these three non-metropolitan territories, which it suspended at its last session while awaiting further information from the Government. Noting that the reports due this year have not been received with regard to one non-metropolitan territory (the French Southern and Antarctic territories), it hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures for their submission in the near future, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Guinea

The Committee notes with deep concern that, for the fourth consecutive year, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received. A total of 47 reports are now due (Conventions Nos 3, 11, 13, 14, 16, 26, 29, 45, 62, 81, 87, 89, 90, 94, 95, 98, 99, 100, 105, 111, 113, 115, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 138, 139, 140, 142, 143, 144, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 156, 159 and 182), most of which should include information in reply to the Committee's comments. The Office once again drew the Government's attention to this worrying situation in its letter of 15 July 2010 pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 99th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2010), in which it emphasized that the resolution of the difficulties encountered by the Government constituted a priority for technical assistance. The Committee notes that the Government benefited from a training scholarship for international labour standards in May 2010 and that the organization of an important tripartite training workshop on constitutional obligations, also envisaged for 2010, had to be postponed due to the situation in the country. The Committee firmly hopes that, as soon as the national situation so permits, the Office will be able to provide all the necessary assistance to the Government so that it can submit all the reports and information due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Guinea-Bissau

The Committee notes with deep concern that, for the fourth consecutive year, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received. A total of 26 reports are now due: the first report on Convention No. 182, due this year, and 25 other reports (Conventions Nos 1, 12, 14, 17, 18, 19, 27, 29, 45, 68, 69, 73, 74, 81, 88, 89, 91, 92, 98, 100, 105, 106, 107, 108 and 111), most of which should include information in reply to the Committee's comments. The Office once again drew the Government's attention to this worrying situation in its letter of 20 July 2010 pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 99th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2010), in which it indicated that the technical assistance provided regularly to the Government since 2008 would be supplemented. According to the Office, discussions are being held on the organization of training in 2011. The Committee firmly hopes that this training will be organized as soon as possible so that the Government is able to submit the reports and information due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Guyana

The Committee notes that, for the third consecutive year, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received. A total of 31 reports are now due (Conventions Nos 2, 12, 19, 29, 42, 45, 81, 87, 97, 98, 100, 105, 108, 111, 115, 129, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 142, 144, 149, 150, 151, 166, 172, 175 and 182), most of which should include information in reply to the Committee's comments. The Office once again drew the Government's attention to this situation in its letter of 15 July 2010 pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 99th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2010). The Committee further notes that the officials responsible for the preparation of reports received training in July 2010 and that, on that occasion, the Government expressed its commitment to improving the sending of reports. The Committee notes with regret that, despite these assurances and the regular follow-up action taken by the Office, the sending of reports was not recommenced this year. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures without delay for the submission of the reports and information due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Kyrgyzstan

As in its previous general observation of 2009, the Committee notes with deep concern that the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received. A total of 39 reports are now due: five first reports on Convention No. 111 (due since 1994), Conventions Nos 17 and 184 (due since 2006) and Conventions Nos 131 and 144 (due since 2009), and 34 other reports (Conventions Nos 11, 16, 23, 29, 69, 73, 77, 78, 79, 81, 87, 92, 95, 97, 98, 100, 105, 108, 115, 119, 120, 122, 124, 133, 134, 138, 147, 148, 149, 150, 154, 157, 159 and 160), most of which should include information in reply to the Committee's comments. In its letter of 26 July 2010 pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 99th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2010), the Office reminded the Government that it is available, as soon as the national situation so permits, to provide any assistance in addition to that regularly provided until 2009. The Committee firmly hopes that the Government will respond to this offer with a view to coping with an important backlog of reports. It urges the Government to take the necessary measures for the submission of the reports and information due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Liberia

The Committee notes that, for the third consecutive year, the Government has not indicated in the reports received the representative organizations of employers and workers to which copies of the reports on the application of ratified Conventions are to be communicated in accordance with article 23, paragraph 2, of the Constitution. It also refers to its comments on the application of Convention No. 144. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay, including by requesting technical assistance from the Office, with a view to discharging its obligations under the Constitution and the above Convention.

Sao Tome and Principe

The Committee notes that the majority of the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received. A total of 13 reports are now due: the first report on Convention No. 184 (due since 2007) and 12 other reports (Conventions Nos 18, 29, 81, 87, 88, 98, 100, 105, 106, 111, 144 and 159), all of which should include information in reply to the Committee's comments. However, the Committee notes that six of the seven first reports due have been received this year and that the Government has recommenced the sending of reports after receiving technical assistance from the Office at the end of 2009. As indicated by the Office in its letter of 20 July 2010 pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 99th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2010), this assistance is to be supplemented. The Committee hopes that the Office will be in a position to provide all appropriate technical assistance in the near future. It requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay to pursue its efforts for the sending of reports and for the submission of all of the reports and information due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Seychelles

The Committee notes that the majority of the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received. A total of 14 reports are now due: four first reports on Conventions Nos 73, 147, 161 and 180, which have been due since 2007, and ten other reports (Conventions Nos 8, 22, 81, 105, 138, 148, 150, 151, 155 and 182), all of which should include information in reply to the Committee's comments. However, the Committee notes that two first reports have been submitted this year, in addition to six other reports. The Government has accordingly taken measures to recommence the sending of reports after benefiting from two training sessions this year on the preparation of reports and on international labour standards in general. In its letter of 22 July 2010 pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 99th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2010), the Office indicated that this training will be supplemented with additional assistance. The Committee hopes that the Office will be in a position to provide all appropriate technical assistance in the near future. It requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay to pursue its efforts for the submission of all of the reports and information due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Sierra Leone

The Committee notes with deep concern that, for the fifth consecutive year, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received. A total of 26 reports are now due (Conventions Nos 8, 16, 17, 19, 22, 26, 29, 32, 45, 58, 59, 81, 87, 88, 94, 95, 98, 99, 100, 101, 105, 111, 119, 125, 126 and 144), most of which should include information in reply to the Committee's comments. The Office drew the Government's attention to this worrying situation in its letter of 22 July 2010 pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 99th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2010), in which it emphasized that the resolution of the difficulties encountered by the Government was a priority for technical assistance. Discussions are being held on the practical arrangements for the provision of such assistance to enable the Government to recommence the sending of reports. The Committee hopes that the discussions between the Office and the Government will result in the adoption of solutions so that the Government can take the necessary measures without delay for the submission of the reports and information due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Solomon Islands

The Committee notes that, for the second consecutive year, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received and that 13 reports are now due (Conventions Nos 8, 14, 16, 19, 26, 29, 42, 45, 81, 84, 94, 95 and 108), most of which should include information in reply to the comments of the Committee of Experts. In its letter of 22 July 2010 pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 99th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2010), the Office indicated its availability to the Government to supplement the training provided in 2008 and 2009, which had enabled the Government to make up part of the backlog in the sending of reports. The Committee hopes that the Office will be in a position to provide any appropriate technical assistance in the near future. It requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay for the identification of more long-term solutions and for the submission of the reports and information due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Somalia

The Committee notes with deep concern that, for the fifth consecutive year, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received. A total of 13 reports are now due (Conventions Nos 16, 17, 19, 22, 23, 29, 45, 84, 85, 94, 95, 105 and 111). As indicated by the Office in its letter of 15 July 2010 pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 99th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2010), the Committee hopes that, as soon as the national situation so permits, the Office will be in a position to provide all the necessary assistance so that the Government can submit the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Thailand

The Committee notes that the majority of the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received. A total of five reports are now due: the first report on Convention No. 159 (due since 2009) and four other reports (Conventions Nos 29, 100, 122 and 182), most of which should include information in reply to the Committee's comments. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay, including by requesting technical assistance from the Office, for the submission of the reports and information due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Uganda

The Committee notes that, for the second consecutive year, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received. A total of 25 reports are now due (Conventions Nos 11, 12, 19, 26, 29, 45, 81, 87, 94, 95, 98, 100, 105, 111, 122, 123, 124, 138, 143, 144, 154, 158, 159, 162 and 182), most of which should include information in reply to the Committee's comments. The Committee takes due note of the explanations provided by the Government representative to the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 99th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2010), reporting administrative and financial difficulties in the collection of information. Discussions are being held with the Office to find solutions to these difficulties. In its letter of 16 July 2010 pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards, the Office emphasized that the measures taken by the Government in 2008 to improve the preparation of reports should be reinforced. In this respect, according to the information provided to the Committee, it is important to reinforce the labour administration, which is affected by a significant lack of resources. The Committee hopes that the discussions between the Office and the Government will lead to solutions so that the Government can take the necessary measures without delay for the submission of the reports and information due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

United Kingdom

Bermuda

The Committee notes that the measures adopted in 2008 and 2009 for the submission of the reports due on the application of the Conventions declared applicable to this non-metropolitan territory have not been followed up this year as none of the reports have been received. A total of ten reports are now due (Conventions Nos 16, 22, 23, 58, 82, 87, 98, 108, 133 and 147).

British Virgin Islands

The Committee notes with deep concern that, for the fourth consecutive year, the reports due on the application of the Conventions declared applicable to this non-metropolitan territory have not been received. A total of 16 reports are now due (Conventions Nos 8, 10, 14, 23, 26, 29, 58, 59, 82, 85, 87, 94, 97, 98, 105 and 108), some of which should include information in reply to the Committee's comments.

Falkland Islands (Malvinas)

The Committee notes with deep concern that, for the fourth consecutive year, the reports due on the application of the Conventions declared applicable to this non-metropolitan territory have not been received. A total of 16 reports are now due (Conventions Nos 8, 10, 14, 22, 23, 29, 32, 45, 58, 59, 82, 87, 98, 105, 108 and 182), some of which should include information in reply to the Committee's comments.

St Helena

The Committee notes that, for the second consecutive year, the reports due on the application of the Conventions declared applicable to this non-metropolitan territory have not been received. A total of 21 reports are now due (Conventions Nos 8, 10, 11, 12, 14, 16, 17, 19, 29, 58, 59, 63, 82, 85, 87, 98, 105, 108, 150, 151 and 182), certain of which should include information in reply to the Committee's comments.

* * *

The Committee notes the statement by the Government representative to the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 99th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2010), recalling that the difficulties relating to the submission of reports in three territories (Falkland Islands (Malvinas), British Virgin Islands and St Helena) were due to a lack of resources, as the territories in question have largely independent administrations, but which have available very limited human and financial resources. In general, the Government is working with the non-metropolitan territories with a view to extending the application to them of a number of fundamental Conventions. While noting the measures taken in this respect, the Committee hopes that due account will be taken of the issue of resources for the sending of the corresponding reports. With regard to the three territories referred to above, for which the backlog in the sending of reports is the most significant, the Committee urges the Government to take all the necessary measures to provide them with the indispensable support, including with the assistance of the Office. It requests the Government to identify long-term solutions for the territory (Bermuda) which is once again experiencing difficulties. The Committee trusts that the Government will be in a position to submit all of the reports and information due on the Conventions declared applicable to all of these non-metropolitan territories, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Vanuatu

The Committee notes that, for the third consecutive year, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received. It recalls that these reports are all first reports: namely the first reports on Conventions Nos 29, 87, 98, 100, 105, 111 and 182, which have been due since 2008, and the first report due this year on Convention No. 185. According to the information provided to the Committee by the Office, numerous training activities have been organized for the Government which, for the first time, participated in a training programme on international labour standards in May 2010. In its letter of 22 July 2010 pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 99th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2010), the Office indicated that it would provide further assistance. The Committee hopes that the Office will be in a position to provide all appropriate technical assistance in the near future, including in the context of the implementation of technical cooperation programmes, through which the available resources can be reinforced. Nevertheless, in view of the training from which the Government has already benefited and so that a first evaluation of the application of all of the ratified Conventions can be undertaken, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures without delay for the submission of the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain points are being addressed directly to the following States: Afghanistan, Algeria, Bahamas, Barbados, Botswana, Brunei Darussalam, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Central African Republic, Chad, Comoros, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Denmark, Ethiopia, Fiji, France, Gambia, Grenada, Haiti, Hungary, Ireland, Kazakhstan, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Liberia, Luxembourg, Republic of Moldova, Myanmar, Netherlands: Aruba, Nigeria, Pakistan, Rwanda, Samoa, San Marino, Singapore, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Ukraine, Yemen, Zambia.

Freedom of association, collective bargaining, and industrial relations

Argentina

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 24 August 2010 and of the Confederation of Argentinean Workers (CTA) of 31 August 2010, which refer to legislative matters already raised by the Committee, and to violations of trade union rights in practice (including the refusal to register the Branch Association of Workers of Subte and Premetro, the dismissal of workers for engaging in protests, and acts of violence against trade union leaders and members in the provinces of Rio Negro and Chubut). The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on this subject. The Committee observes that some of the alleged acts of violence are the subject of a complaint to the Committee on Freedom of Association. Taking into account the nature of the alleged acts, the Committee recalls that the rights of workers' and employers' organizations can only be exercised in a climate that is free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind against the leaders and members of these organizations, and it is for governments to ensure that this principle is respected.

The Committee also notes the comments of the General Confederation of Labour (CGT) dated 13 October 2010.

The Committee further notes the report of the mission undertaken in the month of May 2010 in relation to the application of the Convention, which was of an exploratory nature.

Application by the CTA for trade union status

The Committee recalls that since 2005 it has been noting in its observations that the CTA's application for trade union status (filed in August 2004) is pending. On several occasions the Committee of Experts, in the same way as the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards and the Committee on Freedom of Association (in Case No. 2477), has urged the Government to secure a decision on this matter without delay. In its 2010 comments, the CTA indicates that up to now there has been no decision on its application for trade union status. The Committee notes that, according to the report of the mission which visited the country in 2010, draft resolutions have been submitted in the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate calling for trade union status to be granted to the CTA. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that there are doubts concerning the interpretation of the legal provisions with regard to the possibility of the coexistence of trade union federations covering multiple sectors and that the intervention in the proceedings of the Office of the Prosecutor General of the Ministry of Finance is being considered in its capacity as the highest legal advisory body of the public administration, with a view to obtaining a decision on the matter. In this respect, while noting the new information provided by the Government, the Committee deeply regrets the length of time that has elapsed – over six years – without any decision from the administrative authority on the CTA's application for trade union status. In these circumstances, taking into account the importance of this matter, the Committee once again urges the Government to ensure that a decision is reached on the matter without delay and to provide information on any developments in this regard.

Act on Trade Union Associations and its implementing Decree

The Committee recalls that it has been referring for many years in its comments to certain provisions of the Act on Trade Union Associations (No. 23551) of 1998 and its enabling regulations issued by Decree No. 467/88, which are not in conformity with the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's indications that: (1) the observations relating to the Act were challenged in previous reports and the will of the Government to bring the legislation into conformity was demonstrated once again with the request for ILO technical assistance, which was provided in May 2010; (2) it was indicated to the mission that the views on the need to amend the labour legislation are not unanimous or convergent, and that there has not yet been a decision by the Government on this matter; (3) it is significant that the mission report referred to the existence of positive developments in this respect, emphasizing the broad debate that is being held in society and the convergent opinions of all those concerned to find a solution through dialogue, and that the Government will continue to facilitate dialogue with a view to compliance with its ILO obligations through social dialogue; (4) the climate of social dialogue and the accompanying will to seek solutions is reflected in the statistical trends on existing occupational organizations: 3,025 trade union associations at the first, second and third levels that have been legally registered; 1,534 with trade union status; 1,442 are first level unions or federations; 85 federations; and seven confederations. In June 2009, a total of 3,826,366 workers were members of first-level organizations and 40 per cent of employed persons belong to a union; and (5) when the new officers of the CTA take up their functions, the social partners will be convened in the context of Convention No. 144 to formulate a working agenda covering the subjects which have to be resolved in the light of the Committee's comments.

While welcoming this information, the Committee recalls that its comments concerned the following matters:

Trade union status

- Section 28 of the Act, under which, in order to challenge an association’s trade union status, the petitioning association must have a “considerably larger” membership; and section 21 of implementing Decree No. 467/88, which qualifies the term “considerably larger” by laying down that the association claiming trade union status must have at least 10 per cent more dues-paying members than the organization which currently holds the status. The Committee points out that a requirement of a considerably larger membership, amounting to 10 per cent more members than the union currently holding most representative status, is unduly high and is contrary to the Convention, as in practice, it stands in the way of trade unions that are merely registered being able to claim trade union status.
- Section 29 of the Act, under which an enterprise trade union may be granted trade union status only when no other organization with trade union status exists in the geographical area, occupation or category; and section 30 of the Act, under which, in order to be eligible for trade union status, unions representing a trade, occupation or category must show that they have different interests from the existing trade union or federation and the latter’s status must not cover the workers concerned. The Committee considers that the requirements that unions representing enterprises, trades or categories have to meet in order to obtain trade union status are unduly demanding, and in practice restrict their access to trade union status, giving preferential treatment to existing organizations even where unions representing enterprises, trades or categories of workers are more representative, in accordance with section 28.

Benefits deriving from trade union status

- Section 38 of the Act, under which the check-off of trade union dues is allowed only for associations with trade union status, and not for associations that are merely registered. The Committee recalls that, as emphasized by the Supreme Court of Justice of the Nation (SCJN), the “most representative” status should not imply privileges other than priority of representation in collective bargaining, in consultations with the authorities and in the appointment of delegates to international bodies. The Committee consequently considers that this provision adversely affects and discriminates unduly against organizations that are merely registered.
- Sections 48 and 52 of the Act give special protection (trade union immunity) only to representatives of organizations that have trade union status. The Committee considers that sections 48 and 52 provide preferential treatment for representatives of organizations with trade union status in the event of acts of anti-union discrimination, and that this exceeds the privileges that may be granted to the most representative organizations by virtue of the principle set out in the previous paragraph.

The Committee emphasizes that it has been making these comments for many years and that tangible measures have not been taken to make the requested changes. The Committee recalls that the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards requested the Government in 2007 to join forces with the social partners, with ILO assistance, to formulate draft legislation to give full effect to the Convention.

The Committee notes with interest that the Supreme Court of Justice of the Nation (CSJN) found section 52 of the Act on Trade Union Associations to be unconstitutional in the case Rossi, Adrianna Maria v. National State–Argentine Navy, and that the IVth Chamber of the National Labour Appeal Court found section 29 of the same Act to be unconstitutional in the case Ministry of Labour v. Staff Association of the Catholic University in relation to the Act on Trade Union Associations. The Committee also recalls that in its previous observation it noted the ruling of the CSJN in the case Association of State Workers v. The Ministry of Labour in relation to the Act on Trade Union Associations, in which it found that section 41(a) of Act No. 23551 is in violation of the right to freedom of association, as protected both by article 14bis of the National Constitution and by standards of international rank, since it requires “staff delegates” and the members of the “internal commissions and similar bodies” envisaged in section 40 to be members of “the respective trade union associations with trade union status and to be elected in the elections convened by that association”. With regard to this ruling, the Committee notes the Government’s indication in its report that: (1) section 41 of the Act remains in force in accordance with the constitutional rules as any decision which finds a provision to be unconstitutional, even when issued by the Supreme Court of Justice, is restricted in scope to the particular legal case or question on which it was given and does not in any event imply the repeal or nullity of the provision which will continue to remain in force until it is repealed or amended by the legislative or executive authority which is competent to do so; (2) the system guarantees compliance with the principle of the division of powers, thereby preventing the judicial authorities from taking over areas of competence which are reserved by the National Constitution for other authorities; and (3) the ruling will never have an effect on sections 48 and 52 of the Act on Trade Union Associations, as those provisions were not examined and were not covered by the ruling of the Supreme Court, as they were not applicable to the facts examined in the specific judicial case. The Committee emphasizes that these rulings have the effect of overcoming a significant number of the problems under examination and trusts that they will be taken into account in the process of tripartite dialogue that the Government is endeavouring to pursue.

The Committee also notes that the mission which visited the country in May 2010 noted that various sectors of the Chamber of Deputies submitted draft legislation to amend the trade union laws and that it expressed concern that the proliferation of such drafts would give rise to confusion and delays and that effect would not be given to the Committee's comments. Under these conditions, the Committee requests the Government, taking into account the court rulings finding various sections of the Act on Trade Union Associations (No. 23551) to be unconstitutional, to take the necessary measures, in consultation with all of the social partners, to make the legislative changes requested in relation to the matters covered by these rulings, as well as in relation to all of the pending issues. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in this respect in its next report.

Determination of minimum services

In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the CTA had referred to Decree No. 272/2006 issued under section 24 of Act No. 25877 on collective labour disputes and, specifically, that it objected to the fact that, under the terms of section 2(b) of the Decree, the Guarantees Commission, which includes representation of workers' and employers' organizations and of other independent persons for the determination of minimum services, may only act in an advisory capacity, as the final decision on the determination of the necessary minimum services lies with the Ministry of Labour in final instance in cases where "the parties have not come to an agreement" or "when the agreements are inadequate". In this respect, the Committee requested the Government to: (1) provide information on the cases in which the Guarantees Commission had intervened regarding minimum services and, more specifically, information on the number of occasions on which the administrative authority had not followed the opinion of the Guarantees Commission; and (2) ensure that the Guarantees Commission becomes operational. The Committee notes with satisfaction Decree No. 362 of the National Executive Authorities establishing the Guarantees Commission and appointing its members (with representatives of the Argentine Industrial Union, the Argentine Federation of Law Societies, the National Inter-University Council, the Confederation of Argentinean Workers, the General Confederation of Labour of the Republic of Argentina and the executive authorities). The Committee notes the Government's indication that up to now there has been no collective dispute with the characteristics in which the intervention of the Guarantees Commission is envisaged. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on other cases, during the period covered by the report, in which the Guarantees Commission has intervened in relation to minimum services and whether the administrative authorities followed its recommendations in practice.

Finally, the Committee trusts that, as indicated by the Government in its report, the social partners will meet in the near future to examine the report of the preliminary exploratory mission which was undertaken from 3 to 7 May 2010 with a view to identifying shared solutions for all of the pending matters. The Committee hopes that the outcome of this examination, in which it is to be hoped that the criteria of constitutionality set forth by the judicial authorities referred to above are taken into account, will serve as a basis for the next technical assistance mission with a view to achieving full conformity with the Convention.

Bangladesh

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1972)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 24 August 2010, concerning issues already raised by the Committee as well as serious allegations on killings and physical assaults of protesters and arrests of trade union leaders. The Committee recalls that freedom of association and in particular the right to organize under the Convention can only be exercised in a climate that is free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind against the leaders and members of workers' organizations and that detention of trade unionists for reasons connected with their activities in defence of the interests of workers, constitutes a serious interference with civil liberties in general and with trade union rights in particular. In these circumstances, the Committee urges the Government to provide full particulars in respect of all the allegations of killings, physical assaults and detention of trade unionists and trade union leaders.

The Committee also requests the Government to send information on the other matters raised by the Committee in its 2009 observation (80th Session), for examination in the context of the regular reporting cycle in 2011.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1972)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments on the application of the Convention made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in 2009. It further notes the comments submitted by the National Level Trade Union Federation of Workers (NCCWE), sent along with the Government's report, stating that there is a weak implementation of labour law in general, and more particularly an unwillingness of employers to recognize trade unions and collective bargaining. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection of workers in export processing zones (EPZs) against anti-union discrimination. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that in its 2009 communication, the ITUC referred to numerous problems concerning the application of the Convention in the EPZ sector, particularly in the garment industry. The ITUC further stated that although the law provides for the establishment of an EPZ labour tribunal and an EPZ labour appellate, these two bodies had yet to be established, thus denying workers access to the judicial system for their grievances. The Committee had requested the Government to provide information in respect of these matters, including information on the number of complaints of anti-union discrimination in the EPZ sector submitted to the competent authorities, as well as the outcomes of those complaints.

As concerns the 2009 ITUC comments on harassment, dismissal and violence against workers in the EPZ sector, the Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the Bangladesh EPZ Authority (BEPZA) is not aware of any harassment, dismissal and violence against workers in the EPZ sector.

As concerns the establishment of an EPZ Labour Tribunal and an EPZ Labour Appellate, the Committee had previously noted that according to the Government, EPZ workers could seek judicial redress in cases of anti-union discrimination. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its present report that it has decided to allow the existing labour courts of the country (established under the Labour Act, 2006) to dispose of EPZs industrial disputes and settle the workers' complaints, by incorporating necessary modifications in sections 56 and 59 of the EPZ Workers Welfare Association and Industrial Relation Act (EWAIR Act 2004) (the EPZ labour law). In this respect, the Committee further notes that the EWAIR Act 2004, as amended by the EWAIR Act 2010 is now in the process of being adopted by the Parliament. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to indicate any development in this regard in its next report and to provide a copy of the EWAIR Act 2010, once adopted.

Article 2. Lack of legislative protection against acts of interference. The Committee had previously noted that the Labour Act 2006 did not contain a prohibition of acts of interference designed to promote the establishment of workers' organizations under the domination of employers or their organizations, or to support workers' organizations by financial or other means with the object of placing them under the control of employers or their organizations, and had requested the Government to indicate the measures taken to adopt such a prohibition. The Committee notes the Government's indication that protective measures are laid down in the Labour Act, particularly in sections 195 and 196 concerning "unfair labour practice on the part of the employer", and that such act by the employer is an offence punishable under section 291 of the Labour Act, which provides that such offence is punishable by imprisonment for a term which may extend two years or with a fine of up to 10,000 Taka, or both. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that the Tripartite Labour Law Review Committee (TLLRC) may consider adopting a more comprehensive prohibition, as requested by the Committee. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated so as to adopt a comprehensive prohibition that covers acts of financial control of trade unions or trade union leaders, as well as acts of interference in internal trade union affairs. The Committee hopes that as a first step, the TLLRC will include in its recommendations that a comprehensive prohibition covering acts of financial control of trade unions or trade union leaders, as well as acts of interference in internal trade union affairs should be adopted.

Article 4. Legal requirements for collective bargaining. In its previous comments, the Committee had referred to section 179(2) of the Labour Act, which provides that a trade union may only obtain registration if it represents 30 per cent of the workers in an establishment, as well as to section 202(15) of the Labour Act, which provides that if there is more than one trade union in an enterprise, the Director of Labour shall hold a secret ballot to determine the collective bargaining agent. The Committee notes that according to the Government, there is no percentage requirement for the recognition of a collective bargaining agent. However, the Committee notes that section 202(15)(e) of the Labour Act provides that the trade-union that secures the highest votes is declared as the collective bargaining agent, providing that no trade union shall be declared to be the collective bargaining agent unless it obtains the votes of at least one third of the total workers employed in the establishment. The Committee recalls once again that the percentage requirements for registration of a trade union, and for the recognition of a collective bargaining agent set out in sections 179(2) and 202(15) of the Labour Act 2006, may impair in certain cases, in particular in respect of large enterprises, the development of free and voluntary collective bargaining. The Committee recalls that where, under a system for nominating an exclusive bargaining agent, there is no union representing the required percentage to be so designated, collective bargaining rights should be granted to all unions in this unit, at least on behalf of their own members (see the General Survey, paragraph 241). In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to provide in its next report information on the measures taken or contemplated so as to ensure that, where no union represents one third of the employees in a bargaining unit, collective bargaining rights are granted to all unions in the unit, at least on behalf of their own members.

The Committee further notes that according to NCCWE, collective bargaining is limited as there is no legal provision for collective bargaining at the industry, sector or at national levels. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in this regard.

Promotion of collective bargaining in the EPZs. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to provide information on the extent of collective bargaining in the EPZ sector, including statistics on the number of collective agreements concluded and the number of workers they cover. The Committee notes the Government's indication that 274 enterprises are eligible for workers' associations among 325 in operation and that workers' associations referendums were held in 198 enterprises – or 72.3 per cent of the total number of eligible enterprises. However, no additional information was provided by the Government concerning the conclusion of collective agreements. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the extent of collective bargaining in the EPZ sector, including statistics on the number of collective agreements concluded since 2008, and the number of workers they cover.

Tripartite wages commissions in the public sector. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments, it had requested the Government to take the necessary legislative or other measures to end the practice of determining wage rates and other conditions of employment in the public sector by means of government-appointed tripartite wages commissions (section 3 of Act No. X of 1974). The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that this system does not prevent free and voluntary collective bargaining. Nevertheless, the Committee, while recognizing the singularity of the public sector which allows special modalities, considers that simple consultation with unions of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State do not meet the requirements of Article 4 of the Convention. Therefore, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to end the practice of determining wage rates and other conditions of employment of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State by means of government-appointed tripartite wages commissions, so as to favour free and voluntary negotiations between workers' organizations and employers or their organizations. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate any measures taken or contemplated in this regard.

Barbados

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee takes note of the Government's reply to the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 26 August 2009. The Committee also notes the communication made by the ITUC dated 24 August 2010.

Article 3 of the Convention. The right of organizations freely to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. The Committee recalls that for numerous years it has advised the Government to amend section 4 of the Better Security Act, 1920, according to which any person who wilfully breaks a contract of service or hiring, knowing that this could endanger real or personal property, is liable to a fine or up to three months' imprisonment, so as to eliminate the possibility of employers invoking it in cases of strikes. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the administrative authority has recently undertaken to move towards the drafting of an essential services legislation. The Committee recalls that no penal sanction should be imposed against a worker for having carried out a peaceful strike and measures of imprisonment should not be imposed on any account, including as regards strikes in essential services. Such sanctions could be envisaged only where during a strike, violence against persons or property or other serious infringements of rights have been committed, and can be imposed pursuant to legislation punishing such acts. Nevertheless, even in the absence of violence, if the strike modalities had the effect of making the strike illegitimate, proportionate disciplinary sanctions may be imposed against strikers. The Committee trusts that the Government will take duly into account the abovementioned principle when drafting the essential services legislation. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of any developments in this respect and to provide a copy of the legislation once adopted. Moreover, the Committee once again requests the Government to amend section 4 of the Better Security Act, 1920, so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention.

Finally, the Committee recalls that it has been requesting the Government since 1998 to provide information on developments in the process of reviewing legislation regarding trade union recognition to which the Government had referred, or to indicate whether the drafting legislation process concerning trade union recognition could be considered as abandoned. In its previous observation, the Committees had also noted that the Congress of Trade Unions and Staff Associations of Barbados indicated that the Government submitted an amended Trade Union Act Cap. 361 to trade unions for comment and review. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the drafting process regarding legislation or trade union recognition is ongoing. The Committee requests the Government to provide with its next report information on any development in this respect.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee takes note of the Government's reply to the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 26 August 2009. The Committee also notes the communication made by the ITUC dated 24 August 2010.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee recalls that in previous observations, it had requested the Government to take all the necessary measures to ensure that the legislation provides adequate protection against all acts of anti-union discrimination, in taking up employment and throughout the course of employment, including at the time of termination, and covering all measures of anti-union discrimination (dismissals, demotions, transfers and other prejudicial acts) as well as adequate and dissuasive sanctions. The Committee also noted the comments made by the ITUC referring to the inadequacy of remedies for workers discharged for their union activity since courts may not reinstate dismissed workers. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that section 40A of the Trade Union Act, CAP 361 provides that any employer who dismisses a worker or adversely affects the employment or alters the position of a worker, or threatens to dismiss or to adversely affect or alter the position of a worker, because that worker is, or seeks to become, an officer, delegate or member of a trade union or takes part in trade union activities can be subject to a fine not exceeding $1,000 or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or to both. As regards the amount of the fines, the Committee recalls the importance of making sanctions sufficiently dissuasive against acts of anti-union discrimination or interference. The Committee notes with interest that the Government indicates in its report that it is in the final stages of drafting a new employment rights legislation, which will, inter alia, make provisions for an employment rights tribunal to hear cases of unfair dismissals and to make awards where necessary. Given that it appears that the envisaged protection would only cover cases of unfair dismissals, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention as regards not only anti-union dismissals, but also other prejudicial acts perpetrated against union leaders and members because of their affiliation or trade union activities and in particular, to strengthen the amount of the legal fines and other relevant means which can be applied by the tribunal. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the new employment rights legislation once adopted.

Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135) (ratification: 1977)

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection of workers' representatives. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that a proposed employment rights legislation is at an advanced stage of drafting and is expected to be imminently enacted. The Committee notes with interest that this legislation will, inter alia, provide protection from dismissal by reason of being, or seeking to become, an officer, a shop steward, a safety and health officer, or a delegate of a trade union. Moreover, it will provide for cases to be referred by the Chief Labour Officer to a tribunal in the event that a resolution was not achieved at the level of the Labour Department. The penalty which has been ascribed for breaches of the Act, when passed, is in the range of US$2,000 to US$20,000 and compensation may also be awarded to the complainant under certain circumstances. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the new employment rights legislation when adopted.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1956)

Follow-up to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry (complaint made under article 26 of the Constitution of the ILO)

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government and the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2010. The Committee further notes the comments made by the Congress of Democratic Trade Unions (CDTU) on the application of the Convention in law and in practice in a communication dated 30 August 2010.

Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that in its previous observation it had encouraged the Government to continue its close cooperation with the social partners in addressing the difficulties with registration of trade union organizations in law and in practice. In this respect, the Committee urged the Government to take the necessary measures to amend without delay Presidential Decree No. 2, its rules and regulations, so as to eliminate the obstacles to trade union registration (legal address and 10 per cent minimum membership requirements). The Committee notes the Government's indication that at its sitting of 14 May 2010, the Council for the Improvement of Legislation in the Social and Labour Sphere ("the Council") discussed the issue of the legislation and prospects of work aimed at fulfilment of the Plan of Action on implementation of the Commission's recommendations. On that occasion, the Council established a working group of six members – which include two Government representatives, two worker representatives (one from the Federation of Trade Unions of Belarus (FPB) and one from the CDTU) and two employer organizations representatives – to examine the issues identified by the Council's members and prepare suggestions regarding the Council's decisions, taking into account positions of all parties. The Committee notes that in its communication, the CDTU points out that there have been no concrete proposals to amend Decree No. 2. The Committee is bound to note with regret the absence of any tangible measures taken by the Government to amend the Decree despite the numerous requests by the ILO supervisory bodies and once again urges the Government to take the necessary steps to that effect in consultation with the social partners so as to ensure that the right to organize is effectively guaranteed. The Committee requests the Government to indicate all measures taken in this respect.

The Committee had previously requested the Government to provide information on the number of registered organizations and those denied registration during the reporting period. The Committee notes the Government's indication that 283 new organizational structures have been registered within the first six months of 2010. The Committee notes that while the Government provides no information on the number of denied registrations, the CDTU alleges that its proposals concerning registration of trade union organizations are ignored and not considered and refers to the refusal to register the "Razam" trade union, confirmed by the Supreme Court, and the primary trade union organization of the Belarus Independent Trade Union (BITU) at the "Delta Style" enterprise. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on the CDTU allegations and to provide a copy of the Supreme Court Decision on the "Razam" case. It strongly encourages the Government to continue cooperation with the social partners in addressing the issue of registration in practice and to indicate in its next report all progress made in this respect.

Articles 3, 5 and 6. The Committee recalls that it had previously expressed its concern at the allegations of repeated refusals to authorize the CDTU, the BITU and the Radio and Electronic Workers' Union (REWU) to hold pickets and meetings and requested the Government to conduct independent investigations into these allegations and to bring the attention of the relevant authorities to the right of workers to participate in peaceful demonstrations to defend their occupational interests. The Committee once again notes with regret that no information has been provided by the Government in this respect. Recalling that protests are protected by the principles of freedom of association and that public meetings and demonstrations should not be arbitrarily refused, the Committee notes the conclusions of the Commission of Inquiry in this regard (see Trade Union Rights in Belarus, paragraphs 625–627) and once again requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to investigate the alleged cases of refusals to authorize the holding of pickets and meetings and to bring the attention of the relevant authorities to the right of workers to participate in peaceful demonstrations to defend their occupational interests.

The Committee notes with concern from the CDTU's communication that the chairperson of the Soligorsk BITU regional organization was detained by the police on 4 August 2010 and subsequently found guilty of committing administrative offence and fined. According to the CDTU, the court had decided that having met members of the union near the entrance gate of the company, the trade union leader had violated the Law on Mass Activities. The CDTU explains that following a refusal by the "Delta Style" company's management to authorize a trade union meeting, the chairperson met with several women workers (on their way to their workplaces) near the entrance. Recalling that the right to meet with workers and trade union members is an essential aspect of trade union rights, that the exercise of legitimate trade union activities should not be dependent on registration, and that authorities should refrain from any interference which would restrict this right or impede its exercise, unless public order is disturbed or its maintenance seriously and imminently endangered thereby, the Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on the facts alleged by the CDTU. In this connection, the Committee recalls that for a number of years it has been requesting the Government to amend the Law on Mass Activities and regrets that no information has been provided by the Government on concrete measures taken in this respect.

The Committee further regrets that the Government has not provided any information in relation to the measures taken to amend Presidential Decree No. 24 concerning the use of foreign gratuitous aid and sections 388, 390, 392 and 399 of the Labour Code, regarding the exercise of the right to strike. The Committee also once again notes with regret that aside from the general statement to the effect that a meeting of the tripartite working group took place on 15 October 2010 to discuss the conclusions of the Conference Committee and questions of further work on the improvement of the legislation, and that members of the group were requested to provide their views on further steps in this regard, there was no indication of concrete proposals to amend the abovementioned pieces of legislation. Recalling that the abovementioned legislative texts (Law on Mass Activities, Decree No. 24 and sections 388, 390, 392 and 399 of the Labour Code) are not in conformity with the right of workers to organize their activities and programmes free from interference by the public authorities and their amendment had been requested by the Commission of Inquiry over six years ago, the Committee reiterates its previous requests and requests the Government to indicate all concrete measures taken in this respect.

The Committee also once again requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to ensure that National Bank employees may have recourse to industrial action without penalty.

The Committee recalls that the Government had previously reduced by ten times the price of rent for trade unions irrespective of their affiliation. The Committee notes the CDTU's allegation that the Government has cancelled its previous decision and resumed the practice of hindering trade union activities through financial pressure. The CDTU indicates in this respect that despite numerous promises of the Government, it is still not included in the list of public associations enjoying the right for 0.1 reduction factor in rent payment. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government, according to which, on 5 November 2010, Presidential Decree No. 569 "On making amendments and additions to Presidential Decrees Nos 148 of 24 March 2005 and 518 of 23 October 2009" was adopted to improve the renting mechanism and reduce rental fees for premises rented by trade unions. According to the Government, all trade unions, regardless of their affiliation, can now benefit from the tenfold reduction of rental fee.

The Committee notes with regret that no substantial progress has been made by the Government towards implementing the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and improving the application of this Convention in law and in practice during the reporting year. Indeed, the Government has not provided any information on steps taken to amend the legislative provisions in question, as previously requested by this Committee, the Conference Committee, the Commission of Inquiry and the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Committee notes that in 2010, it has only been informed of one meeting of the Council (14 May) and one meeting of its tripartite working group (15 October). It further notes that the only indicated outcome of the 15 October meeting was a proposal for its members to submit their views on further steps to take with a view to improving the legislation in light of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, something that the Council has been said to be considering for a number of years already. The Committee therefore urges the Government to intensify its efforts to ensure that freedom of association is fully and effectively guaranteed in law and in practice and expresses the firm hope that the Government will intensify its cooperation with all the social partners in this regard.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1956)

Follow-up to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry (complaint made under article 26 of the Constitution of the ILO)

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government and the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2010. The Committee further notes the comments made by the Congress of Democratic Trade Unions (CDTU) on the application of the Convention, in law and in practice, in a communication dated 30 August 2010 and the Government's reply thereon.

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that it had previously noted with concern the 2009 comments made by the CDTU on the continuing discriminatory use of fixed-term contracts. The CDTU alleged, in particular, that members of free and independent unions are forced to leave their unions under the threat of non-renewal of their contracts and provided the following statistics on the impact of threats of non-renewal of fixed-term contracts on its affiliates: primary trade union at "Grodno-Azot" enterprise had lost 930 members since 2006; primary trade union at "Belshina" enterprise in Bobruisk – 50 members since 2006; primary trade union at "Polimir" chemical company in Novopolotsk – nearly 400 members since 2006; and primary trade union at Mozyr oil refinery company – at least 50 members since the beginning of 2009. The CDTU further alleged that trade union membership of primary trade unions at "Zenit" company in Vileika (Minsk region), Brest Pedagogical University, hydraulic power station in Novolukoml, and other small union organizations also suffered. According to the CDTU, the scenario of pressure on workers in all these cases was almost the same: the floor managers or managers on ideology would invite trade union members to sign statements indicating that they were leaving independent unions and discontinuing payment of trade union membership dues. Those who refused were threatened with dismissal and non renewal of their fixed-term contracts. The Committee had expressed the firm hope that the Council for the Improvement of Legislation in the Social and Labour Sphere ("the Council") would examine the allegations of anti-union discrimination and interference suffered by the CDTU-affiliated trade unions and their members at the abovementioned enterprises, as well as at "Mogilev ZIV", "Avtopark No. 1", with regard to the members affiliated to the Radio and Electronic Workers' Union (REWU) and requested the Government to inform it of the outcome of the discussion and of measures taken to redress the damages suffered. The Committee regrets that no information has been provided by the Government in this respect.

The Committee further notes with concern that in its recent communication, the CDTU alleges that this pressure on independent trade unions, through the short-term contract system, has continued and that Presidential Decree No. 164 of 31 March 2010 (to improve contract-based scheme of employment) has not solved the problem. The Committee understands that this Decree entitles an employer to conclude an employment contract for an indefinite term with an employee who has not violated labour discipline and who has worked for the employer for no less than five years, but does not deal with unfair use of the system.

The Committee further notes with concern the CDTU's allegation that the number of violations of trade union rights has been increasing and that its members are still suffering from anti-union discrimination, including dismissal, non-renewal of labour contracts, pressure and harassment. In particular, the Committee notes with regret a case where a trade union activist of the Belarus Independent Trade Union (BITU) was dismissed from the Lukoml Power Station. The Committee observes that while at its June 2010 session, the Conference Committee noted the Government's statement that this person was reinstated in December 2009 following the court decision, it appears now that the dismissal was confirmed on 21 May 2010 following an appeal by the employer and the prosecutor's office.

The Committee further notes the allegations of threats and interference in internal trade union affairs and a new wave of pressure put on workers to leave their union at the Bobruisk plant of tractor parts and units (Belarusian Free Trade Union primary trade union), "Grodno-Azot" company, "Delta Style" company in Soligorsk, "Lavanstroj" construction company, Minsk automated line company (all BITU primary trade unions).

The Committee notes with regret that according to the CDTU, the Government refuses to use the tripartite council to discuss in substance the issue of trade union rights' violation. The Committee notes with regret that in this regard, the Government has not referred to any discussions taking place at the Council sitting on 14 May 2010 or at the meeting of 15 October 2010 of a tripartite working group created by the Council, with reference to anti-union dismissals, threats, interference and pressure.

The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that all of the abovementioned allegations of anti-union discrimination and interference relating to the CDTU and REWU-affiliated trade unions and their members at all of the abovementioned enterprises, are brought to the attention of the Council without further delay. It requests the Government to inform it of the outcome of the discussion and of any remedial measures taken should it be found that anti-union discrimination and interference have occurred.

Furthermore, the Committee once again urges the Government to take measures to ensure that enterprise managers do not interfere in the internal affairs of trade unions and, on the other, instructions to the Prosecutor-

General, Minister of Justice and court administrators that all complaints of interference and anti-union discrimination are thoroughly investigated. Should such complaints prove true, the necessary measures should be taken to put an end to such acts and punish those responsible.

Article 4. The Committee recalls that it had previously noted that at its meeting of 26 November 2009, the tripartite council discussed the issue of collective bargaining at enterprises with several trade union organizations, as well as development of social partnership including the conclusion of collective agreements at “Grodno-Azot” and “Naftan” enterprises. It requested the Government to keep it informed of the outcome of this discussion. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the situation with the collective agreement at “Naftan” has been positively resolved and that the CDTU-affiliated trade union had joined the agreement concluded by the Federation of Trade Unions of Belarus (FPB). The Committee notes with concern, however, the CDTU’s indication that its proposals with regard to social partnership at “Naftan” and “Grodno-Azot” have been ignored or not considered at all. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

The Committee welcomes the Government’s indication that a tripartite working group, where trade unions are represented by both the FPB and the CDTU, has been created to prepare a new General Agreement for 2011–13. The Committee requests the Government to provide all relevant information in this respect.

The Committee strongly encourages the Government to intensify its efforts to ensure full implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry without delay, in close cooperation with all the social partners and with the assistance of the ILO. The Committee further expresses the firm hope that the Government and the social partners will continue the cooperation within the framework of the tripartite Council and that the latter will have a real impact on ensuring that the right to organize is effectively guaranteed in law and in practice.

[The Government is asked to supply full particulars to the Conference at its 100th Session and to reply in detail to the present comments in 2011.]

Belgium

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1951)

Comments from trade union organizations. The Committee notes the communication dated 21 December 2009 from the Confederation of Christian Trade Unions (CSC), the General Labour Federation of Belgium (FGTB) and the General Confederation of Liberal Trade Unions of Belgium (CGSLB) concerning in particular a court decision restricting the autonomy of trade unions in the exercise of their disciplinary powers, and also the systematic recourse by employers to the judicial authority in order to prohibit collective action on the part of the trade unions, particularly the installation of strike pickets. The Committee recalls that it previously noted the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 26 August 2009 concerning this same point. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations in reply to the comments made by the ITUC and to the communication from the CSC, FGTB and CGSLB.

Article 3 of the Convention. The Committee also recalls that it has been commenting for many years on the need to take steps to adopt objective, pre-established and precise legislative criteria determining the rules for access of the occupational organizations of workers and employers to the National Labour Council. In its previous observation the Committee noted the information to the effect that a political agreement was reached in September 2009 in consultation with the most representative workers’ and employers’ organizations to amend the Organic Act of 29 May 1952 in such a way as to establish quantitative and qualitative criteria which the most representative organizations wishing to be represented on the National Labour Council would have to meet. The Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption of the Act of 30 December 2009 issuing various provisions, in particular Chapter 6 of Title 10 of the aforementioned Act, which amends the principal laws relating to collective labour relations, including the Organic Act of 22 May 1952 of the National Labour Council. The Committee notes that, under the terms of the Act, workers’ organizations must now satisfy in a cumulative manner the following criteria of representativeness: being constituted at national level and operating on an inter-occupational basis; representing the majority of sectors and staff categories in the public and private sectors; having a minimum number of paid-up members; and including the defence of workers’ interests among the objectives laid down by its rules.

Botswana

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1997)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 24 August 2010 as well as the Government’s reply. The Committee also notes the comments made by the Education International and the Botswana Teachers’ Union (BTU) in a communication dated 26 August 2010 concerning the Government’s interference in the internal organization of the BTU by imposing the retirement of its President from his teaching duties to prevent him from heading the teachers' union. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to:

- amend section 48B(1) of the Trade Union and Employers' Organizations (TUEO) Act, which grants certain facilities (access to an employer's premises for purposes of recruiting members, holding meetings or representing workers; the deduction of trade union dues from employees' wages, recognition by employers of trade union representatives in respect of grievances, discipline, and termination of employment) only to unions representing at least one third of the employees in an enterprise;
- amend section 10 of the TUEO Act, so as to afford industrial organizations the opportunity to rectify the absence of some of the formal registration requirements provided for in that section, and to repeal sections 11 and 15, which result in the automatic dissolution and banning of activities of non-registered organizations;
- amend section 43 of the TUEO Act, which provides for inspection of accounts, books and documents of a trade union by the registrar at "any reasonable time" and indicate the practical application of sections 49 and 50 of the TUEO Act which provide for the inspection by the minister of the financial affairs of a trade union "whenever he considers it necessary in the public interest", including the frequency with which these sections are invoked to inspect trade unions finances;
- amend sections 9(1)(b), 13 and 14 of the Trade Disputes Act, which empower the commissioner and the minister to refer a dispute in essential services to arbitration, or to the industrial court for determination; and to amend the list of essential services specified in the Schedule of the Trade Disputes Act, which includes, among others, the Bank of Botswana, railway services, and the transport and telecommunications services necessary to the operation of all of these services.

In this regard, the Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that consultations with the social partners on amendments of all labour legislations are still ongoing. The Committee hopes that due account will be taken of its comments in the process of amending the relevant labour legislations. The Committee requests the Government to provide information, in its next report, on any progress made in this regard. The Committee encourages the Government to avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office if it so wishes.

Employees in the prison service. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to amend section 2(1)(iv) of the TUEO (Amendments) Act, 2003 and section 2(11)(iv) of the Trade Disputes Act, both of which specifically exclude employees of the prison service from their scope of application, as well as section 35 of the Prisons Act, which prohibits prison officers from becoming members of a trade union or any body affiliated to a trade union. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that it has no intention to grant the employees of the prison service the right to unionize since their staff association, as provided for in the Prison Act, supposedly caters adequately for the negotiations on their welfare, and terms and conditions of employment. However, the Committee notes that according to section 35(3) of the Prison Act, a prison officer may only become a member of an association established by the minister and regulated in the manner prescribed and that there is no other provision concerning the right to unionize under the Prison Act. In these circumstances, the Committee once again requests the Government to amend the abovementioned sections of the TUEO, the Trade Disputes Act and the Prison Act in order to grant to prison staff the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1997)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 24 August 2010, and the Government's reply.

Scope of the Convention. Application of the Convention to prison staff. The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend section 2 of the Trade Disputes Act, section 2 of the Trade Union and Employers' Organizations (Amendment) Act (TUEO), and section 35 of the Prison Act, so as to ensure that prison staff are afforded all the guarantees provided under the Convention. The Committee notes from the Government's report that it has no intention to grant prison staff the right to unionize since their staff association, as provided for in the Prison Act, supposedly caters adequately for the negotiations on their welfare, terms and conditions of employment. However, the Committee notes that according to section 35(3) of the Prison Act, a prison officer may only become a member of an association established by the Minister and regulated in the manner prescribed; and that under section 35(4), any prison officer who becomes a member of a trade union or any body affiliated to a trade union shall be liable to be dismissed from the service. The Committee recalls that all public service workers other than those engaged in the administration of the State should enjoy protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference and their union should enjoy bargaining rights. Therefore, the Committee once again requests the Government to amend the Trade Disputes Act, the TUEO Act and the Prison Act to ensure to prison staff the rights enshrined in the Convention.

Article 1 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee had further noted the Government's statement that consultation was ongoing concerning the ITUC's previous observation according to which if a trade union is not registered, union committee members are not protected against anti-union discrimination (e.g. article 23 of the Employment Act). The Government does not refer to this issue in its report. In these circumstances, recalling that the Government is responsible for preventing all acts of anti-union discrimination in order to give effect to Article 1 of the Convention, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that all union committee members, including those of unregistered trade unions, enjoy an adequate protection against anti-union discrimination.

Articles 2 and 4. Protection against acts of interference and promotion of collective bargaining. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to provide information on the progress made with respect to the following legislative changes:

- the adoption of specific legislative provisions ensuring adequate protection against acts of interference by employers or employers’ organizations in the establishment, functioning or administration of trade unions, coupled with effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions;
- the repeal of section 35(1)(b) of the Trade Disputes Act, which permits an employer or employers’ organization to apply to the Commissioner to withdraw the recognition granted to a trade union on the grounds that the trade union refuses to negotiate in good faith with the employer; and
- the amendment of section 20(3) of the Trade Disputes Act, so as to ensure that compulsory arbitration of disputes of interest is permissible only in the following instances: (1) where the party requesting arbitration is a trade union seeking a first collective agreement; (2) disputes concerning public servants directly engaged in the administration of the State; and (3) disputes arising in essential services. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that it has included in the National Development Plan 10 a project to establish an independent dispute resolution system.

The Committee notes from the Government’s report that consultations with the social partners on all labour legislation are still ongoing. The Committee requests the Government to indicate, in its next report, any progress made on the abovementioned provisions and it hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future. The Committee encourages the Government to avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office if it so wishes.

ITUC’s comments. The Committee notes the ITUC’s comments concerning the necessity for a trade union to represent a significant proportion of the workforce in order to bargain collectively. The Committee notes the Government indication that in terms of section 48 of the TUEO Act as read with section 32 of the Trade Dispute Act, the minimum threshold to be recognized by the employer is set at one third of the workforce of any organization. The Committee recalls that where, under a system for nominating an exclusive bargaining agent, there is no union representing the required percentage to be so designated, collective bargaining rights should be granted to all unions in this unit, at least on behalf of their own members. The Committee requests the Government to provide in its next report information on the measures taken or contemplated so as to ensure that where no union represents one third of the employees in a bargaining unit, collective bargaining rights are granted to all unions in the unit, at least on behalf of their own members.

Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151) (ratification: 1997)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes the Trade Union and Employers’ Organizations (TUEO) (Amendment) Act, 2003, and the Trade Disputes (Amendment) Act, 2004.

Article 1 of the Convention. The Committee had noted that the TUEO Act had been amended and now includes the “public officers”, including the unified local government service and the unified teaching service. However, the Committee noted that the Botswana prison service is still excluded from the scope of the Public Service Act, the TUEO Act and the Trade Disputes Act. The Committee also noted the Government’s statement that the Botswana prison service has been determined by national laws and regulations to be providing a security service. In this respect, the Committee recalled that under Article 1, only the police, the armed forces, high-level employees, whose functions are normally considered as policy-making or managerial, and employees whose duties are of a highly confidential nature, may be excluded from the scope of the Convention. Accordingly, the Committee requests the Government to amend section 2 of the Trade Union and Employers’ Organizations (TUEO) (Amendments) Act, 2003, section 2 of the Trade Disputes Act, and section 35 of the Prisons Act so as to guarantee for the prison service the rights enshrined in the Convention.

Article 5. The Committee notes that the current legislation does not provide adequate protection to public employees’ organizations from acts of interference by the public authorities in their establishment, functioning or administration. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the Public Service Act is being reviewed and consideration will be given to the Committee’s comments. Therefore, the Committee requests the Government to ensure that draft legislation contains precise provisions providing adequate protection to public employees’ organizations from acts of interference by the public authorities in their establishment, functioning or administration.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Bulgaria

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1959)

Article 3 of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the Confederation of Independent Trade Unions of Bulgaria (CITUB) on the issues it has been raising for a number of years and, in particular, the need to amend the following provisions:

- section 11(2) and (3) of the Collective Labour Disputes Settlement Act, which provide that the decision to call a strike shall be taken by a simple majority of the workers in the enterprise or the unit concerned, and section 11(3) which requires the duration of the strike to be declared;
- section 51 of the Railway Transport Act of 2000, which provides that, where industrial action is taken under the Act, the workers and employers must provide the population with satisfactory transport services corresponding to no less than 50 per cent of the volume of transportation that was provided before the strike. The Committee recalled previously that, as the establishment of too broad a minimum service restricts one of the essential means of pressure available to workers to defend their economic and social interests, workers' organizations should be able to participate in defining such a service, along with employers and the public authorities; in cases where agreement is not possible, the issue should be referred to an independent body; and
- the restrictions on the right to strike of public servants under the terms of section 47 of the Civil Servant Act, including public servants who cannot be considered as exercising authority in the name of the State.

The Committee notes that in its report, the Government: (i) with regard to the strike vote, reiterates its commitment to the tripartite consultations with a view to reaching a mutually acceptable solution that would address the recommendations of the Committee; (ii) on the issue of the right to strike in the railway transport sector, stresses its will to resolve this issue and achieve progress in the near future, and indicates that it has initiated internal expert discussions about a possible amendment of the Railway Transport Act; and (iii) states that is ready to reopen the discussion on the right to strike of civil servants with a view to finding a solution, welcomes ILO technical assistance, and indicates that a working group was established to make proposals for legislative amendments to ensure compliance with the Convention. The Committee welcomes the information provided by the Government and hopes that in the process of legislative amendments due note will be taken of its comments as well as of the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2696. The Committee requests the Government to transmit any new legislative text once adopted. It trusts that the ILO will continue providing its technical assistance as requested by the Government.

With regard to its previous comments on section 11(3) of the Collective Labour Disputes Settlement Act, which requires the duration of the strike to be declared, the Committee takes due note of the Government's indication that a strike could be declared for an indefinite period of time or until fulfilment of the demands made.

The Committee once again requests the Government to provide the legal text which repealed the prohibition on strikes in the energy, communication and health sectors.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1959)

The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to provide its observations on the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the Confederation of Independent Trade Unions in Bulgaria (CITUB) on the lengthiness of anti-union discrimination proceedings. The Committee notes that the Government refers to section 310(1) of the Code of Civil Procedure (entered into force in 2008), according to which, claims of illegal dismissal, reinstatement, compensation are examined through summary procedure. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the average length of anti-union discrimination proceedings in practice.

Article 2 of the Convention. Protection against acts of interference. Previously, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure adequate protection, including by means of dissuasive sanctions, against acts of interference by employers' organizations. The Committee notes that the Government once again refers to section 33 of the Labour Code – which provides for the autonomy of workers' and employers' organizations in formulating their statutes, electing their representatives, and adopting their programmes of action. The Government considers that it is not necessary to have an explicit ban on the acts of interference. In this respect, the Committee once again recalls that under Article 2 of the Convention, all acts which are designed to promote the establishment of workers' organizations under the domination of employers' organizations, or to support workers' organizations by financial means with the object of placing such organizations under the control of employers or employers' organizations, shall be deemed to constitute acts of interference. The Committee further recalls that legislation should explicitly prohibit all such acts of interference and make express provision for rapid appeals procedures, coupled with effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against acts of interference, in order to ensure the application in practice of Article 2. Moreover, to ensure that these measures receive the necessary publicity and are effective in practice, the relevant legislation should explicitly lay down these substantive provisions, as well as appeals and sanctions to guarantee their application (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 232). Noting that the legislation contains no provisions concerning such protection as described above, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure adequate protection, including by means of dissuasive sanctions, against acts of interference by employers' organizations.

Article 4. The Committee had previously noted that sections 51(b)(1) and (2) of the Labour Code provided that collective agreements at the level of the branch or industry are concluded between the representative workers' and employers' organizations on the basis of an agreement between the national organizations to which they are respectively affiliated. It further noted, in this respect, the Government's statement that organizations not affiliated to a national representative organization cannot conclude collective agreements at the branch and sectoral levels, though they may do so at the enterprise level. Considering that requiring organizations to be affiliated with a national organization in order to be able to conclude sectoral and branch level agreements is incompatible with the principle of free and voluntary collective bargaining established in Article 4 of the Convention, the Committee requested the Government to amend sections 51(b)(1) and (2) of the Labour Code. The Committee notes the Government's indication that it is ready to conduct the necessary consultations with the aim of reaching a mutually acceptable decision on this matter. The Committee welcomes the statement of the Government and expects that the necessary legislative amendments will be adopted in the near future and requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard.

Articles 4 and 6. The Committee had previously taken note of the comments made by the ITUC and the CITUB on the denial of collective bargaining rights to public servants and requested the Government to take the steps necessary to amend the Civil Service Act so as to ensure the right to collective bargaining of all public servants, with the only possible exception being those engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates that, despite the absence of the right of collective bargaining in the narrow sense of the term, under section 44(3) of the Civil Service Act, trade unions are able to represent and defend the rights of civil servants on civil service and social security issues through proposals, requests, and participation in the drafting of relevant internal regulations and ordinances, as well as in the discussion of issues of economic and social interest. Legislatively regulated issues could not be subject to collective bargaining. The Government adds that representatives of organizations of civil servants may take part in the competition commission for the selection of candidates to the civil service, as well as participate in the process for the appraisal of civil servants. Issues related to income and social security in the public service, however, are discussed in the National Council for Tripartite Cooperation, in which all nationally representative employers' and workers' organizations are represented. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that it is ready to conduct the necessary consultations with the aim of reaching a mutually acceptable decision on this matter. The Committee welcomes the statement of the Government and expects that the necessary legislative amendments will be adopted in the near future and requests the Government to indicate any development in this regard.

The Committee had previously noted the comments of the Bulgarian Industrial Association (BIA) on the application of the Convention. The BIA indicated that section 51(a), (b) and (c) of the Labour Code grants workers' organizations the right to submit draft collective agreements but that the same right is not extended to employers' organizations. The Committee requested the Government to respond to the BIA's comments. The Committee notes that the Government confirms that according to the legislation in force, the draft collective agreement is prepared and presented by trade unions. At the time of negotiations, however, each of the parties is free to propose amendments to the draft. Employers' organizations are free to make their own proposal and are not obliged to accept the draft as proposed by the union. Only a collective agreement that satisfies the interests of both parties is signed.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future. It reminds the Government that it may avail itself of ILO technical assistance.

Burkina Faso

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 24 August 2010 concerning the application of the Convention and reporting dismissals of trade union delegates and members for participation in strikes. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on these matters and on the ITUC's comments of 2009.

Article 3 of the Convention. Occupation of premises in the event of a strike. The Committee noted previously that, under section 386 of the Labour Code, the exercise of the right to strike shall on no account be accompanied by occupation of the workplace or its immediate surroundings, subject to the penal sanctions established in the legislation in force. In this respect, the Committee recalled that any restrictions on strike pickets and workplace occupations should be limited to cases where the action ceases to be peaceful or where observance of the freedom of non-strikers to work, or the right of management to enter the premises, are impeded. The Committee notes that the Government's report does not provide any information on this subject. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 386 of the Labour Code as indicated above so that the restrictions that it envisages only apply in cases in which a strike ceases to be peaceful or where observance of the freedom of non-strikers to work and the right of management to enter the premises are impeded.

Requisitioning of public employees. In its previous comments, the Committee recalled the need to amend sections 1 and 6 of Act No. 45-60/AN of 25 July 1960 under which, in order to ensure continuity of administration and the safety of persons and property, public servants may be required to perform their duties. The Committee pointed out that it would be advisable to restrict the powers of the public authorities to requisition workers to cases in which the right to strike may be limited or even prohibited. Noting the Government's statement that it was planning to revise Act No. 45-60/AN, the Committee requested the Government to indicate any amendment or repeal of sections 1 and 6 of that Act. Noting the absence of information in this respect, the Committee reiterates its request to the Government to indicate any measures taken to amend or repeal sections 1 and 6 of Act No. 45-60/AN to take into account the principles referred to above.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes the comments from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 26 August 2009 and 24 August 2010 concerning anti-union practices, particularly dismissals and transfers. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations in this respect.

Article 4 of the Convention. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee had hoped that the Government would soon be able to indicate the approximate number of workers and sectors covered by the collective agreements in force and had asked it to give an account of all measures to promote collective bargaining (including in the bakery, road transport and media sectors, in relation to which the Committee asked for information in its previous comments), particularly those taken by the Directorate of Labour Relations and Promotion of Social Dialogue (DRPPDS).

As regards the approximate number of workers and sectors covered by the collective agreements in force, the Committee notes the Government's indication that constraints due to the elections have prevented the compilation of the requested information. However, the Government adds that it hopes that the elections will take place as soon as possible and will enable the numbers of workers covered by the collective agreements in force to be determined. The Committee requests the Government to send the requested information as soon as it is available.

As regards the measures to promote collective bargaining, particularly those taken by the DRPPDS, the Committee notes the Government's indication that: (1) the DRPPDS has held consultations with the social partners concerning the revision of the inter-occupational collective agreement; (2) during these consultations, the social partners expressed the wish focus on negotiations aimed at the conclusion or revision of sectoral agreements; (3) the DRPPDS has therefore identified the sectors of activity covered by previous agreements and those which are not covered, in order to encourage the social partners to engage in collective negotiations; and (4) training aimed at strengthening the capacity of the social partners for collective negotiations have been held and other training, in cooperation with the Programme of Social Dialogue in Francophone Africa (PRODIAF), is planned. The Committee also notes with regard to the media sector that the sectoral collective agreement was negotiated and signed on 6 January 2009 and dialogue is ongoing with respect to the bakery, road transport, banking and financial establishment sectors. The Committee requests the Government to send information on any developments in this sphere and indicate the collective agreements which have been concluded.

Collective bargaining in the public sector. As regards the public service advisory bodies, including the tripartite Public Service Advisory Council, which has competence for dialogue (section 51 of Act No. 013/98/AN of 28 April 1998 concerning the public service), the Committee previously noted the indication that the employees had not yet appointed their representatives and asked the Government to supply information on any new developments in this respect. The Committee also asked the Government to specify the categories of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State who enjoy the right to collective bargaining.

In this respect, the Committee notes the adoption of Act No. 019-2005/AN of 18 May 2005 amending Act No. 013/98/AN of 28 April 1998. It also notes the Government's indication that all public officials, with the exception of officials having the duties of director-general, technical director or departmental director who are engaged in the administration of the State, fully enjoy the right to collective bargaining. Noting that the Government's report does not contain any information concerning the representatives to the Public Service Advisory Council, the Committee requests the Government to: (1) indicate whether these representatives have been appointed and also any new developments in this area and; (2) send a copy of Act No. 019-2005/AN of 18 May 2005 amending Act No. 013/98/AN of 28 April 1998 in order to evaluate the application of the right to collective bargaining of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State.

Burundi

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee requests the Government to send its observations on the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and by the Trade Union Confederation of Burundi (COSYBU) on the application of the Convention.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of public employees without distinction whatsoever to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. The Committee once again notes with regret the lack of the statutory provisions on the right to organize of magistrates and observes that this situation is the reason behind difficulties of registration of the Trade Union of Magistrates of Burundi (SYMABU). The Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary measures without delay in order to adopt such statutory provisions so as to ensure and clearly define the right to organize of magistrates.

Right to organize of minors. For several years, the Committee has been raising the matter of the compatibility of section 271 of the Labour Code with the Convention, as this section provides that minors under the age of 18 may not join a trade union without the explicit permission of their parents or guardians. The Committee requests the Government to recognize the right to join trade unions of minors under 18 years of age who are engaged in an occupational activity without the permission of their parents or guardians being necessary.

Article 3. Right of workers' and employers' organizations to draw up their constitutions and rules, elect their representatives in full freedom, organize their administration and activities and formulate their programmes without interference by the public authorities. Election of trade union officers. The Committee recalls that its previous comments related to section 275 of the Labour Code which sets the following conditions for holding the position of trade union officer or administrator:

- Criminal record. Under section 275(3) of the Labour Code, holders of trade union office may not have been sentenced to imprisonment without suspension of sentence for more than six months. The Committee recalls that conviction for an act which, by its nature, does not call into question the integrity of the person and implies no real risk for the performance of trade union duties should not constitute grounds for exclusion from trade union office.
- Belonging to the occupation. Section 275(4) of the Labour Code requires trade union leaders to have belonged to the occupation or trade for at least one year. The Committee previously requested the Government to make the legislation more flexible by allowing persons who had previously worked in the occupation to stand for office or by lifting this requirement for a reasonable proportion of trade union officers.

The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 275(3) and (4) of the Labour Code, taking fully into account the principles recalled above.

Right to strike. In its previous comments, the Committee raised the matter of the succession of compulsory procedures to be followed before calling a strike (sections 191–210 of the Labour Code), which appear to authorize the Minister of Labour to prevent all strikes. Recalling that the right to strike is one of the essential means available to trade unions to further and defend the interests of their members, the Committee urges the Government to adopt and provide a copy of the text to be issued under the Labour Code on the modalities for the exercise of the right to strike, taking into account the principles recalled above.

The Committee also noted that, under section 213 of the Labour Code, strikes are lawful when they are called with the approval of a simple majority of the employees of the workplace or enterprise. The Committee recalled that, when voting on strikes, the ballot method, the quorum and the majority required should not be such that the exercise of the right to strike becomes very difficult in practice. If a member State sees fit to establish in its legislation provisions requiring a vote by workers before a strike can be held, it should ensure that account is taken only of the votes cast and that the required majority and quorum are fixed at a reasonable level (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 170). The Committee urges the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken to amend section 213 of the Labour Code in the light of the comments made above.

In its previous observation, the Committee noted that the Government had adopted a legislative decree prohibiting the exercise of the right to strike and to demonstrate throughout the national territory during the period of the elections. According to the Government, this legislative decree has not been used in practice. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether this legislative decree was repealed following the elections.

The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that trade union organizations can exercise in full their right to organize their activities freely without interference from the public authorities.

The Committee notes that the Government has set up a tripartite committee responsible for rapidly proposing new provision of the Labour Code which would take into account the claims of the social partners, the reports of the labour inspection and the comments of the Committee. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any progress made in revising the Labour Code and recalls that technical assistance of the Office is at its disposal.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Finally, the Committee notes the comments made by the ITUC, dated 24 August 2010, concerning the application of the Convention, in particular, the allegations of death threats against trade union leaders, the attack against the President of the Free Trade Union of Medical Doctors of Burundi (SYMABU), as well as other acts of intimidation. The Committee recalls that the rights of the workers' and employers' organizations can only be exercised in a climate that is free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind against the leaders and members of these organizations, and it is for governments to ensure that this principle is respected. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in this respect.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1997)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee urges the Government to send its observations in response to the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the Trade Union Confederation of Burundi (COSYBU) concerning the application of the Convention.

*Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Non-dissuasive nature of the sanctions established by the Labour Code for violations of Article 1 (protection of workers against acts of anti-union discrimination) and Article 2 (protection of employers' and workers' organizations against any acts of interference by each other) of the Convention. In its past comments, the Committee had noted that, according to the Government, the provisions in question would be amended with the collaboration of the social partners. The Committee regrets that no amendments have been made to the legislation and, recalling the need to establish sufficiently dissuasive sanctions, hopes that the Government will be able to make the necessary amendments to the legislation in the near future. The Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any progress achieved in this respect.

*Article 4. Right of collective bargaining in practice. The Committee noted previously that there was only one collective agreement in Burundi. The Committee noted that, according to the Government, it is for the social partners to take the initiative to propose collective agreements and that in practice they limit themselves to concluding enterprise agreements of which there are many in para-public enterprises. The Committee recalls that, although nothing in the Convention places a duty on the Government to enforce collective bargaining by compulsory means with the social partners, this does not mean that governments should abstain from any measure whatsoever aiming to establish a collective bargaining mechanism. The Committee notes the launch of a capacity-building programme for the social partners and once again asks the Government to provide information on the precise measures adopted to promote collective bargaining, together with information of a practical nature on the situation with regard to collective bargaining and, in particular, to indicate the number of collective agreements concluded up to now and the sectors covered. The Committee hopes that the Government will be able to indicate substantial progress in its next report.

*Article 6. Right of collective bargaining for public servants not engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee notes the shortcomings in social dialogue in the public service pointed out by the ITUC and the COSYBU. The Committee previously requested the Government to specify whether provisions that imply restrictions on the scope of collective bargaining for the public service as a whole are still in force in Burundi, particularly as regards the determination of wages, such as: (1) section 45 of Legislative Decree No. 1/23 of 26 July 1988, which provides that, following approval by the relevant ministry, the governing councils of public establishments set the level of remuneration for permanent and temporary posts and determine the conditions for appointment and dismissal; and (2) section 24 of Legislative Decree No. 1/24, which provides that governing councils of public establishments draw up staff regulations for personalized administrations subject to the approval of the competent minister. The Committee noted that, in its reply, the Government indicated that these provisions were still in force, but that, in practice, state employees participate in determining their terms and conditions of employment. According to the Government, they are aware of the right of collective bargaining, and this is the reason for the existence of agreements in the education and health sectors. In the case of public establishments and personalized administrations, the employees participate in the determination of remuneration as they are represented on the governing councils, and wage claims are submitted to the employer by enterprise councils or trade unions, with the competent minister only intervening to safeguard the general interest; in certain ministries, trade union organizations have obtained bonuses to supplement wages. The Committee once again asks the Government to take measures to align the legislation with practice and, in particular, to amend section 45 of Legislative Decree No. 1/23 and section 24 of Legislative Decree No. 1/24 so as to ensure that organizations of public servants and employees who are not engaged in the administration of the State can negotiate their wages and other terms and conditions of employment.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Cambodia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 24 August 2010, concerning acts of violence and harassment against trade union leaders and members as well as other violations of the Convention. The Committee notes, in particular, the information provided by the ITUC regarding the absence of a labour court, the overall deficiency of the judicial system in respect of the murders of trade unionists Chea Vichea and Ros Sovannareth and the persistent climate of repression towards trade union activities.

The Committee further notes the comments made by the Free Trade Union of Workers of the Kingdom of Cambodia (FTUWKC) dated 31 August 2010, indicating that independent trade unions remain fragile, under-resourced and operating in an extremely difficult context; that the FTUWKC struggles to be recognized by the Government as a valid stakeholder in the policy-making process; and that there has been no let up in anti-union harassment, intimidation and dismissal of union members, who continue to face police violence, attacks, weak law enforcement and employer impunity. The Committee also notes that the FTUWKC indicates that the 2009 Law on Peaceful Demonstrations severely impacts on the organization of strikes, rallies and other union activities and that the 2009 Penal Code, by retaining defamation and disinformation as criminal offences, potentially affects trade union activities. The Committee urges the Government to send its observations on all the issues raised by the ITUC and the FTUWKC in its next report.

In addition, the Committee notes the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association concerning the murders of trade union leaders Chea Vichea, Ros Sovannareth and Hy Vuthy and the continuing repression of unionists (Case No. 2318) as well as the denial of the right to form trade unions of public employees (Case No. 2222).

As regards the impunity prevailing in the murder of the abovementioned trade unionists, the Committee recalls that two individuals were convicted for the murder of Chea Vichea (Sok Sam Oeun and Born Samnang) and Thach Saveth was convicted of the murder of Ros Sovannareth in trials that were fraught with judicial irregularities and an absence of due process. Despite international calls for full, independent and impartial investigations since the moment of these murders, as well as that of Hy Vuthy, the Government has failed to provide any information on the steps taken in this regard or to provide any independent report. While noting that the convictions of Sok Sam Oeun and Born Samnang were remanded to the Appeal Court by the Supreme Court and that they have now been released on bail, the Government has yet to provide any information on the investigations to be carried out to determine the actual murderers and instigators of the assassination of Chea Vichea. Moreover, Thach Saveth has been awaiting a review of his conviction by the Supreme Court for several years now. No information has been provided on the progress made of investigations into the murder of Hy Vuthy.

Finally, the Committee takes note of the discussions on Cambodia in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (June 2010). It notes in particular that the Conference Committee regretted the lack of information relating to the long-awaited independent investigations into these murders. The Conference Committee recalled that freedom of association rights of workers and employers can only be exercised in a climate free from violence, pressure and threats and urged the Government to ensure respect for this fundamental principle and bring an end to impunity by taking the necessary steps, as a matter of urgency, to ensure full and impartial investigations into the murders of these trade union leaders and to bring, not only the perpetrators, but also the instigators of these heinous crimes to justice. Moreover, noting the serious flaws observed in the judicial process, as already observed by the Supreme Court, the Conference Committee indicated that it expected that the criminal charges against those earlier convicted for these murders would be immediately dropped and that the Supreme Court would rapidly review the appeal by Thach Saveth and ensure his release.

Trade union rights and civil liberties. In its previous observation, the Committee urged the Government to take all the necessary measures to ensure that the trade union rights of workers were fully respected and that trade unionists were able to engage in their activities in a climate free of intimidation and risk. The Committee takes note of the comments made by the ITUC as well as of the discussion during the Conference Committee, regarding the persistent climate of violence and intimidation towards union members. The Committee recalls, once again, that freedom of association can only be exercised in a climate that is free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind against leaders and members of workers' organizations and that detention of trade unionists for reasons connected with their activities in defence of the interests of workers, constitutes a serious interference with civil liberties in general and with trade union rights in particular. The Committee further recalls that workers have the right to participate in peaceful demonstrations to defend their occupational interests. In light of the above, the Committee once again urges the Government to take all the necessary measures, in the very near future, to ensure that trade union rights of workers are fully respected and that trade unionists are able to engage in their activities in a climate free of intimidation and risk to their personal security and their lives, in accordance with the abovementioned principles.

As regards the murders of trade unionists Chea Vichea, Ros Sovannareth and Hy Vuthy, in its previous observation the Committee requested the Government, to take concrete and tangible steps, as a matter of urgency, to carry out independent inquiries and to facilitate an expedited review of the convictions of Born Samnang and Sok Sam Oeun for the murder of Chea Vichea as well as of the conviction of Thach Saveth for the murder of Ros Sovannareth, and to take steps for their release pending the outcome of the above independent inquiries. The Committee notes that the Government indicated during the discussions in the Conference Committee that Born Samnang and Sok Sam Oeun had been released on bail, pending the re-hearing of their case by the Appeal Court, after the Supreme Court found inadequacies in the criminal procedure. The Government adds in its report that it had not received information on the prospective date of the re-hearing. The Committee notes that the FTUWKC indicates that, while on 17 August 2009, the Appeal Court ordered Chea Vichea's case to be reopened for further investigation, no subsequent inquiries were carried out. The Committee notes with concern that the Government does not provide any information in its report on any progress made with regard to the investigations into these three murders. The Committee therefore once again urges the Government to bring an end to impunity by taking the necessary steps, as a matter of urgency, to ensure full and impartial investigations into the murders of the abovementioned trade union leaders and to bring, not only the perpetrators, but also the instigators of these heinous crimes to justice. In particular, the Committee urges the Government to provide, with its next report, precise and detailed information on:

- (i) the steps taken to exonerate Born Samnang and Sok Sam Oeun of all charges brought against them and to return the bail paid, as well as to reopen a full investigation into the murder of Chea Vichea as requested by the Supreme Court;
- (ii) the awaited review by the Supreme Court of the decision of the Appeal Court regarding the conviction of Thach Saveth for the murder of Ros Sovannareth, and the opening of an investigation into that crime; and
- (iii) the outcome of the investigation into the murder of Hy Vuthy.

Independence of the judiciary. In its previous observation, the Committee, noting the conclusions of the ILO direct contacts mission of April 2008, referring to serious problems of capacity and lack of independence of the judiciary, requested the Government to take concrete and tangible steps, as a matter of urgency, to ensure the independence and effectiveness of the judicial system, including capacity-building measures and the institution of safeguards against corruption. In this regard, the Committee notes the report of the UN Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Cambodia of 16 September 2010, which recommends various steps to enhance the independence of the judiciary and, in particular, the adoption without delay of the Law on the Status of Judges and Prosecutors and the Law on the Organization and Functioning of the Courts. The Committee requests the Government to provide, with its next report, information on the measures taken or contemplated to ensure the independence and effectiveness of the judicial system, in particular as regards the adoption of the Law on the Status of Judges and Prosecutors and the Law on the Organization and Functioning of the Courts, together with a copy of the relevant legislations.

Rule of law and legislative developments. Finally, the Committee notes that the Government recalled during the discussions in the Conference Committee that: (i) it was considering the creation of a labour court in accordance with international standards; and (ii) the draft Trade Union Law on which it is working in cooperation with the ILO will be adopted by Parliament in 2011 and it expects the law to guarantee the right of workers and employers to organize and bargain collectively. The Government adds in its report that the Working Group of the Ministry of Labour and Vocational Training has finished its review of the draft Trade Union Law consisting of 17 chapters (90 articles), that the draft has now been sent to the ILO for review, that it will then be brought to consult with workers' and employers' associations separately and that it will then be put in the open multi-party meeting (gathering representatives of Government's institutions, trade unions, employer associations and international organizations, including the ILO and the International Finance Corporation (World Bank Group)). The Committee requests the Government to provide, with its next report, information on the creation of the labour court and the adoption of the Trade Union Law, as well as on the consultation processes held in that respect.

Recalling its request to the Government to make every effort to take the necessary action to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention, the Committee reminds the Government that, if it so wishes, it may have recourse to the technical assistance of the Office.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes the comments submitted on 24 August 2010 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) which refer to matters already under examination, as well as to serious and numerous acts of anti-union discrimination and interference, obstacles to collective bargaining and social dialogue. The Committee also notes the comments submitted on 31 August 2010 by the Free Trade Union of Workers of the Kingdom of Cambodia (FTUWKC). The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon in its next report.

The Committee notes that in the framework of the discussions on the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2010 (99th Session) emphasizes the need to ensure that the current reform process brings the legislation into greater conformity with the Convention. It also notes the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association regarding the deficient legislative framework for cases of anti-union discrimination and the non-recognition of collective bargaining rights for civil servants (see Cases Nos 2443, 2655 and 2222).

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union discrimination. In its previous observation, the Committee referred to the need for appropriate legal protection against acts of anti-union discrimination, including sufficiently dissuasive sanctions, and had requested the Government to indicate the measures adopted in order to modify the legislation so as to provide for such sanctions. The Committee notes that in its comments of 24 August 2010, the ITUC reports severe cases of anti-union discrimination and anti-union dismissals, including of pregnant women. The Committee also notes that the discussion during the Conference Committee in June 2010 pointed out the persistent climate of violence and intimidation towards union members, including the failure of the system to protect trade union leaders and members from acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the efficiency of the implementation of the Labour Law improved thanks to the ILO's technical assistance and that at the end of March 2010, a high-level tripartite consultation on industrial relations finalized a consensus between trade union and employers' associations on nine points that will assist the harmonization of industrial relations pending the drafting of the new law on trade union. The Committee underlines the need to take steps without delay to adopt an appropriate legislative framework in full consultation with the social partners to ensure adequate protection against all acts of anti-union discrimination, dismissals and other prejudicial acts, including by means of sufficiently dissuasive sanctions.

Article 4. Recognition of trade unions for purposes of collective bargaining. In its previous observation, the Committee took note of Prakas No. 13 of 2004, which lays down the procedure for granting most representative status to professional organizations at the enterprise or institutional level. The Committee noted in particular that section 1 of Prakas No. 13 provides that the Ministry of Social Affairs, Labour, Vocational Training and Youth Rehabilitation (MOSALVY) may refuse to grant most representative status to a trade union when an objection is put forward from a member of the Labour Advisory Committee, or from enterprises, institutions or a concerned third party. The Committee considered in this respect that permitting the objections of third parties as grounds for refusing a union most representative status ran counter to the principle of promoting collective bargaining expressed in Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that the determination of the most representative organizations must be based on objective, pre-established and precise criteria so as to avoid any possibility of bias or abuse (see the 1994 General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 97). The Committee notes with regret that the Government indicates in its report that no progress has been made in this respect. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to amend section 1 of Prakas No. 13 accordingly, and to provide information on the progress made in this respect in its next report.

Articles 4 and 6. Right to collective bargaining of public servants. The Committee had previously noted that according to section 1 of the Labour Law, certain categories of workers, which include persons appointed to a temporary or a permanent post in the public service, are not covered by this legislation. It had further noted that the Committee on Freedom of Association (see Case No. 2222, 334th and 356th Reports) had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the Common Statute of Civil Servants so as to guarantee the right to collective bargaining of civil servants not engaged in the administration of the State, and requested the Government to indicate whether the categories of workers in question benefit from the guarantees provided for in the Convention under other legal provisions and, if not, to take the necessary measures in order to ensure the application of the Convention to these categories of workers. The Committee noted in this regard the Government's statement that since the rights of judges, teachers, and temporary and permanently appointed officials in the public service were provided for by separate laws pertaining to public ministries or institutions, it was unable to amend the labour law in accordance with the Committee's requests.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report, that under the Common Statute of Civil Servants, salaries of civil servants should be automatically increased on their third year of employment and if their salary is not increased within two years, in the third year, civil servants can complain to the public function secretariat or to the court. The Committee recalls however that wages, benefits and other labour conditions constitute matters of collective bargaining. The Committee also notes that the Government indicated during the discussions in the Conference Committee in June 2010, that it was considering guaranteeing the right of collective bargaining to civil servants.

Concerning the application of the Convention in practice, the Committee notes with concern the comments made by the ITUC recalling that the Cambodian Independent Teachers Association and the Cambodian Independent Civil Service Association (civil servants' association) are not recognized as trade unions by the Ministry of Labour and therefore do not enjoy collective bargaining rights. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the laws pertaining to all public sector workers, so as to ensure the right to collective bargaining for all public servants, including teachers, with the only possible exception of those engaged in the administration of the State. More particularly, the Committee urges the Government to immediately take the necessary measures to amend the Common Statute of Civil Servants so as to guarantee fully the right to collective bargaining. The Committee requests the Government to provide with its next report information regarding any developments in this respect.

Revision of the legislation. The Committee notes that the Government indicated during the discussions in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2010, that it was working in cooperation with the ILO on a draft Trade Union Law to be adopted by Parliament in 2011 and that it expected the Law to guarantee the right of workers and employers to bargain collectively through the streamlining of rules for the certification of the union with the most representative status, the creation of a legal framework for collective bargaining agreements and the definition of unfair labour practices by employers and workers. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures in the near future to ensure full consultation with the social partners concerned with respect to labour law reform and to ensure their full and equal participation in all relevant social dialogue forums. The Committee requests the Government to provide, with its next report, information on these matters, as well as a copy of the legislation once adopted.

Application of the Convention in practice. Noting the comments made by the ITUC in August 2010 according to which collective bargaining is rare and difficult and only a few unions have managed to conclude collective agreements, the Committee expresses its concern about this information and reiterates its request to the Government to communicate in its next report statistics on the collective agreements (workers and sectors covered in the different regions, and number of collective agreements).

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1979)

Article 4 of the Convention. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee notes the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2622 (March 2010 meeting) asking the Government to take all necessary steps, in consultation with the social partners, to amend or repeal section 110 of the Labour Code requiring the parties to a collective agreement to bear the cost of publishing it in the Official Journal. The Committee on Freedom of Association drew the Committee of Experts' attention to this matter. The Committee notes with interest that Legislative Decree No. 5/2010 of 16 June 2010 now provides that collective agreements may be published on the Ministry of Labour's website.

In its previous comments the Committee noted that very few collective agreements had been concluded. It noted that the Government had sent a copy of two collective agreements (telecommunications and private security), and pointed out that collective bargaining must be voluntary and that the role of the Government was to promote it without forcing it. The Government added that technical assistance from the Office for building the capacity of the social partners in collective bargaining techniques would contribute to improving the situation. The Government indicated that the social partners agreed to a request for such assistance.

The Committee notes in this connection the comments of 19 February 2010 by the National Workers' Union of Cape Verde–Trade Union Confederation (UNTC-CS) and the Cape Verde Confederation of Free Trade Unions (CCSL). According to the UNTC-CS, there are various reasons for the drop in the number of collective agreements concluded and these include a lack of commitment on the part of the institutions engaged in the promotion of collective bargaining, and a lack of resolve in enforcing the few collective agreements that do exist. The CCSL, for its part, asserts that the Government has been unable to raise awareness and promote collective agreements as measures consist only of seminars or workshops that produce nothing concrete in terms of collective agreements. The main sectors of the economy (air transport, dock work, insurance, water and energy supply, health, education, public administration) are in the charge of the Government, which lacks the legitimacy and credibility to promote and order the conclusion of collective agreements in other sectors.

The Committee also notes the information from the Government that despite a slight increase in the number of collective conventions concluded, the total number of agreements is still low. As regards the economic sectors referred to by the CCSL, it notes the Government's statement that a collective agreement has been adopted with the enterprise ELECTRA SA and that an agreement concluded with the enterprise TAP-Air Portugal is to be published shortly.

The Committee expresses concern that so few collective agreements have been concluded. It notes that the Government has asked for technical assistance from the ILO Dakar Office to promote voluntary collective bargaining and that it has already planned a series of conferences to this end, which are now under way. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will pursue its efforts and requests it to indicate any developments in this area. It hopes that the technical assistance requested will be forthcoming in the very near future.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes the comments from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on the application of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on the ITUC comments, dated 26 August 2009 and 24 August 2010.

The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it requested the Government to amend the legislation on the minimum service organized by the employer to be maintained in the public service that is indispensable for safeguarding the general interest (section 248-15 of the Labour Code), in order to limit the minimum service to operations which are strictly necessary to meet the basic needs of the population, within the framework of a negotiated minimum service. In this regard, the Committee noted that the Government had indicated that section 248-15 had indeed been amended but that it was not in a position to produce the copy of the text amending the provisions of the said section. The Committee recalls that, since the definition of a minimum service restricts one of the essential means of pressure available to workers to defend their economic and social interests, their organizations should be able, if they so wish, to participate in defining such a service, along with employers and the public authorities. The parties might also envisage the establishment of a joint or independent body responsible for examining rapidly and without formalities the difficulties raised by the definition and application of such a minimum service and empowered to issue enforceable decisions (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 161). The Committee again expresses the hope that the text amending section 248-15 of the Labour Code takes account of these principles and requests the Government to send a copy of the text as soon as possible.

The Committee requests the Government to send a copy of the draft revised Labour Code.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1991)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 24 August 2010.

Article 3 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee recalled that since 1996, it has been commenting over the issue of the distribution of trade union assets and urged the Government to determine the criteria for the division of trade union assets in consultation with workers' organizations and to fix a specific time frame for completing the division of the property. The Committee had noted the Government's indication that for the division of trade union assets to be addressed, it was first necessary to establish the criteria for determining the representativeness of trade unions. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that, in April 2009, the Minister of the Economy, Labour and Entrepreneurship issued a decision specifying the names of the associations meeting the requirements laid down in article 2 of the Act on the Method of Determining the Representation of Trade Union Associations of a Higher Level in Tripartite Bodies at the National Level (OG 18/99) and the number of trade unions affiliated to these associations. In these circumstances, taking into account that the representativeness criteria has been defined, the Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures in the very near future to address the issue of the distribution of trade union assets and requests the Government to provide information thereon in its next report.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 24 August 2010 on the application of the Convention, in particular as regards the impact on collective bargaining of the 2009 Act on the Basis for Wages in Public Services. It also notes the comments made by the Trade Union of State and Local Government Employees (TUSLGE) dated 16 August 2010. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon in its next report.

Article 1 of the Convention. In its previous observation, the Committee, referring to allegations of excessive court delays in dealing with cases of anti-union discrimination, had noted that a comprehensive process of reform had been initiated to enhance the efficiency of the judicial process and reduce the backlog of cases and that a pilot project on mediation in courts showed positive results. The Committee notes that, while the Government does not provide further information in this respect, the ITUC indicates that there has been an important reduction of the backlog of cases but that procedures remain too long, that monitoring and follow-up by the State Inspectorate and the judicial system of violations of workers' rights remain weak, and that trade unions call for the establishment of genuine labour courts in order to expedite the resolution of labour conflicts. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the progress made with respect to the measures aimed at improving the efficiency of the legal protection, as well as a copy of the instruments adopted as a result of the reform process.

Articles 4 and 6. In its previous observation, the Committee had requested the Government to comment upon the allegations that the Act on Salaries in Public Services limits collective bargaining rights in the public sector by setting coefficients for the workplace, with the result that public sector workers can negotiate on their basic salaries only. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report regarding salaries' adjustment clauses, in particular, that certain collective agreements include clauses on adjustment of wages according to the economic policy in place, and that others may vary contingent on the level of non-taxable income. The Committee further notes that the TUSLGE indicates that the Local and Regional Self-Government Wage Act of 19 February 2010 restricts the rights to organize and bargain collectively of employees of local and regional self-governments, in particular their right to bargain collectively over the wage formation basis. The Committee requests the Government to provide information thereon in its next report.

Furthermore, the Committee had noted the allegations that the Act on the realization of the Government's budget of 1993 allows the Government to modify the substance of a collective agreement in the public sector for financial reasons. It had requested the Government to provide a copy of the legislative provisions allowing the Government to modify the substance of collective agreements in the public service and information on their application in practice. Recalling that, in general, a legal provision which allows one party to modify unilaterally the content of signed collective agreements is contrary to the principles of collective bargaining, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide, with its next report, a copy of the said legislative provisions, as well as information on their application in practice.

Czech Republic

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 24 August 2010 and the Government's reply thereon. The Committee further notes the comments made by the Czech-Moravian Confederation of Trade Unions (CMKOS) concerning the application of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon in its next report.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union discrimination and interference. The Committee's previous observation concerned measures taken to increase the efficiency of the system of protection against anti-union discrimination and interference and to address the alleged slowness of the procedures. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that there have been no changes in this regard, and that there are statutory safeguards against acts of trade union discrimination which include, inter alia, the possibility for alleged victims to refer the abuses to labour inspection bodies, courts, as well as to the Ministry of Interior. The Committee also notes that the ITUC indicates that while the 2009 anti-discrimination law provides for equal treatment with regard to trade union membership and activities, it does not sufficiently protect workers against anti-union discrimination. The Committee further notes the information provided by the Government according to which the labour inspection has not found proved anti-union discrimination acts. The Committee recalls that general legal provisions prohibiting acts of anti-union discrimination shall be accompanied by effective and rapid procedures to ensure their application in practice. Furthermore the Committee recalls that legislation should not only prohibit all acts of interference, but also make express provisions for rapid appeals procedures, coupled with effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against such acts, in order to ensure the application in practice of Article 2 (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraphs 214, 223 and 232). The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to provide in its next report an overall assessment of the effectiveness of the system of protection against anti-union discrimination and interference, in consultation with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations, including data on the number of complaints brought to the labour inspection and the courts in the last years, as well as the duration of proceedings and their outcome.

Article 4. Collective bargaining. The Committee takes due note of the decision of the Constitutional Court of 14 April 2008, repealing certain provisions of the Labour Code (Act No. 262/2006) concerning collective bargaining agreements. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report, that section 24(2) of the Labour Code stipulates that, in the case where a collective agreement has to be concluded within a single employer enterprise, when the enterprise involves more than one trade union, and when the trade unions concerned cannot act jointly and in mutual consent, the employer may enter into a collective agreement effective for all employees, with the one or more trade union organizations with the largest membership. The Committee notes that the Constitutional Court repealed this provision of the Labour Code, considering that it infringed the constitutional principle of equality of trade union organizations which prevents any preferential treatment of any trade union organization, within an enterprise or a sector. The Committee recalls that systems of collective bargaining with exclusive rights for the most representative trade union and those which enable the participation of all the trade unions concerned in the conclusion of a collective agreement or which allow for the existence of various collective agreements are all compatible with the principles of freedom of association.

The Committee notes that the constitutional court has rendered a sentence (No. 116/2008 Coll) which repealed certain provisions of the Labour Code. More particularly, the provisions that afforded the right of trade unions to supervise the compliance with the legislation and collective agreements have been repealed. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report if the trade unions still have the right to denounce to the authorities cases of non-compliance with the legislation and collective agreements.

Furthermore, the Committee notes the comments made by the ITUC concerning the little scope for negotiations on pay in the public sector and obstacles to collective bargaining in the healthcare service. The Committee also notes that according to the information provided by labour inspection bodies, in some cases employers, by their inactivity, complicate collective bargaining. Noting that the Government did not provide any information in this regard in its reply to the ITUC, the Committee requests the Government to provide in its next report its observations about these ITUC comments and to provide further information on the findings of the labour inspection bodies.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Democratic Republic of the Congo

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on 24 August 2010 concerning the application of the Convention which mention the arrest of trade unionists, their torture and ill treatment during their detention and acts of interference in trade union activities. The Committee recalls that the arrest of trade unionists can create an atmosphere of intimidation and fear prejudicial to the normal development of trade union activities and emphasizes the importance of ensuring that trade unionists receive a fair trial in accordance with the principles enshrined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observation in reply to the comments made by the ITUC without delay.

Articles 2 and 5 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 1 of the Labour Code excludes from its scope magistrates, career officials in the State public services governed by the general conditions of service and career employees and officials of the State public services governed by specific conditions of service. The Committee requested the Government to provide further information on the trade union rights of these categories of State employees. The Committee also noted that, under section 56 of Act No. 81-003 of 17 July 1981 issuing the conditions of service of career members of the State public services, public officials and employees were affiliated automatically to the then Union of Workers of Zaire (UNTZA). However, pending the amendment of these conditions of service, the Minister for the Public Service had issued Order No. CAB.MIN/F.P./105/94 of 13 January 1994 establishing provisional regulations concerning trade union activities within the public administration, amended by Order No. CAB.MIN/F.P./0174/96 of 13 September 1996. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the reform of the public administration is still under way and that the draft revised conditions of service of career members of the State public services will shortly be submitted to Parliament. The Committee further notes that the report indicates that trade union pluralism is effective within the public administration and that the rights of public officials are defended within the joint committee composed of representatives of trade unions and the Government. Finally, the Committee notes that the report indicates that the freedom of association of the magistrates governed by specific conditions of service is recognized and that there are trade unions in this sector. The Committee requests the Government to: (i) take the necessary measures to ensure that the reform of the public administration and the revision of the conditions of service of career members of the State public services allow, as soon as possible, all State employees to benefit from the guarantees provided under the Convention; (ii) indicate any developments in this regard in its next report, in particular the repeal of section 56 of Act No. 81-003; and (iii) provide information in its next report on the instruments governing the special status and trade union rights of magistrates.

Article 3. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to facilitate the organization of trade union elections in various branches of activity and to provide specific information on the results of these elections. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that, by means of Circular No. 1 of 20 May 2008, it organized trade union elections for "enterprises and establishments of any kind", which were held between October 2008 and July 2009. The Committee also notes that a tripartite committee is responsible for counting the votes and determining the most representative trade unions. The Committee recalls that the determination of the most representative trade union should always be based on objective and pre-established criteria so as to avoid any opportunity for partiality or abuse and that verification of the representative character of a union should be carried out by an independent and impartial body. Noting that more than one year has elapsed since the end of these elections, the Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the results of this process.

The Committee raises other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1969)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee noted the Government's reply to the questions raised by the Trade Union Confederation of the Congo (CSC) and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on the application of the Convention.

The Committee had noted with interest that the Government stated that it intends to give effect to the Committee's recommendation to conduct an independent investigation in order to clarify the questions raised by the ITUC and by the CSC concerning: (1) acts of discrimination and anti-union interference in private enterprises (including threats of dismissal against union members despite the fact that section 234 of the Labour Code prohibits acts of anti-union discrimination); (2) the existence of many unions established and financed by employers; and (3) the failure to comply with collective agreements. The Committee again requests the Government to indicate the developments and conclusions of the independent investigation.

Article 2 of the Convention. Protection against acts of interference. The Committee noted previously that, according to the Government, the National Labour Council has not yet adopted the draft Order prohibiting acts of interference. The Committee recalled that, although section 235 of the new Labour Code prohibits all acts of interference by organizations of employers and workers in each others' affairs, section 236 provides that acts of interference must be defined more precisely. The Committee noted the Government's reply to the effect that the National Labour Council has not yet taken a decision on the draft Order prohibiting acts of interference. To that end, the Committee noted that the Government undertakes to provide a copy of the Order once it has been adopted. The Committee hopes that the Order concerned will be adopted as soon as possible and requests the Government to provide information on developments in this regard.

Article 6. Collective bargaining in the public sector. The Committee noted previously that section 1 of the Labour Code explicitly excludes from the Code career members of the state public services who are governed by the general conditions of service (Act No. 81-003 of 17 July 1981 issuing the conditions of service of career members of state public services and explicitly providing for the establishment of institutions ensuring the representation of the personnel) and career employees and officials of state public services who are governed by specific conditions of service. The CSC had indicated the existence of measures allowing the establishment of mechanisms for the promotion of collective bargaining in the public sector. The Committee had noted the information provided by the Government concerning the right of public employees not engaged in the administration of the state to engage in collective bargaining, and particularly: (1) the agreement of 11 September 1999 on basic wages concluded by the Government and the unions of the public administration at a meeting of the joint committee; (2) the "social contract for innovation" of 12 February 2004 concluded by the Government and the unions of the public administration; and (3) the agreement concluded by the Government and the unions of the public administration following a strike by unions in the education sector in 2005. The Committee had concluded that, in practice, there were wage negotiations and agreements in the public sector.

The Committee observed that the Government has sent the text of Ministerial Order No. 12/CAB.MIN/TPS/ar/NK/054 of 12 October 2004, establishing the procedures for the representation and recourse to elections of workers in enterprises or establishments of all types. The Committee also noted the Government's indication that it intends to regulate the salaries of public servants set by negotiated agreements in the context of the imminent reform of the public administration. In this regard, the Committee also notes the comment by the ITUC that the staff of decentralized entities (towns, territories and sectors), who comprise a subcategory of public servant, do not enjoy the right to bargain. The Committee reiterates its previous request to the Government to take steps to ensure that the legislation guarantees the right of collective bargaining for public servants not engaged in the administration of the State, as established under Articles 4 and 6 of the Convention, and requests the Government to indicate the developments concerning the reform of the public administration.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

The Committee notes the observations made by the ITUC and requests the Government to send its reply.

Djibouti

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes with deep concern the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 24 August 2010 concerning the application of the Convention, in particular, the allegations concerning the total prohibition imposed on the Labour Union of Djibouti (UDT) to develop its activities; according to the ITUC, the Government accuses trade unionists of being enemies of the State and they are therefore arrested, detained, transferred or dismissed. Moreover, according to the allegations, the Government continues to favour fake organizations, thereby preventing the UDT's representatives from participating in the International Labour Conference, and undertakes police controls at the entrance of the headquarters of the UDT. Given that the Government has not provided any observations on these comments and taking into account their seriousness and the fact that the authorities have prohibited the activities of the UDT – which is the most representative trade union organization – the Committee draws the attention of the Government to the fact that the exercise of trade union rights can only take place in a climate free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind and that the prohibition imposed on a trade union federation to develop its activities constitutes a direct violation of the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide, without delay, its observations on the comments made by the ITUC, not to proceed with the measures adopted against the UDT and its leaders and to ensure that the physical integrity of all threatened trade unionists is protected.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Legislative problems. The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the provisions of Act No. 133/AN/05/5<sup>e</sup> L of 28 January 2006 issuing the Labour Code. The Act was denounced by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and also by the Labour Union of Djibouti (UDT) and the General Union of Djibouti Workers (UGTD) as challenging fundamental rights relating to freedom of association. The Committee noted that, according to the report of the direct contacts mission undertaken in January 2008, the Government reaffirmed that all the social partners were consulted in the process of preparation of the Labour Code. However, the Committee noted that the Government held working meetings with the mission to consider the points of divergence between the national legislation and the Conventions in order to rectify them and that it undertook to bring the recommended solutions to the attention of a tripartite National Council for Labour, Employment and Vocational Training (CNTEFP), which was due to be constituted. The Committee noted that, in its report of May 2008, the Government reiterated its commitment to reviewing certain provisions of the legislation in order to bring them into conformity with the Convention and bring them to the attention of the CNTEFP. In this respect, the Committee noted the warning contained in the report of the direct contacts mission regarding any excessive delay in constituting the CNTEFP and the impact thereof on the adoption of the necessary legislative amendments. It also noted the mission's recommendation that, in a context where the representativeness of workers' organizations has not yet been established in a clear and objective manner, no representation from the trade unions in Djibouti should be discarded from the work of the CNTEFP. The Committee endorses the recommendations of the direct contacts mission on this point and requests the Government to indicate whether the CNTEFP has been constituted and state the composition thereof.

The Committee wishes to remind the Government of its comments concerning the following points of divergence between the Labour Code and the Convention:

- Sections 41 and 42 of the Labour Code. These provisions concern the suspension of employment contracts. Section 41 provides that the employment contract shall be suspended, among other cases, for the duration of any regular, political or trade union office held by the worker which is not compatible with paid employment (paragraph 8). Section 42 provides in addition that the period during which the employment is suspended shall not be counted for the purpose of determining the worker's seniority within the undertaking. The Committee considers that the holding of trade union office is not incompatible with professional life and, consequently, any worker holding trade union office should be able to remain employed. The Committee therefore considers that sections 41 and 42 of the Labour Code, in providing for a more or less automatic suspension of the employment contract when a worker holds trade union office, are likely to be detrimental to the rights of all workers to establish and join the organization of their own choosing or to hold trade union office (Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention). The Committee therefore requests the Government to amend sections 41 and 42 of the Labour Code by providing that the possibility of suspending the employment contract during a period in which a worker holds a trade union office that is incompatible with a professional activity is a matter for negotiation between the employer and the trade union, who must establish the relevant arrangements, and that in any case such suspension cannot be automatic.
- Section 214 of the Labour Code. This section provides that any person convicted "by any court" may not hold office as a trade union leader. The Committee recalls that a law which generally prohibits access to trade union office because of any conviction is incompatible with the principles of freedom of association (Article 3 of the Convention), when the activity condemned is not prejudicial to the attitude and integrity required to exercise trade union office. In this case, the Committee considers that section 214 of the Code, in deeming any person who has been convicted to be unsuitable for trade union office, is formulated too broadly and would cover situations in which the nature of the conviction is not inherently such as to rule out the holding of trade union office. The Committee therefore requests the Government to amend section 214 of the Labour Code so as to ensure that only court convictions for offences which by their nature call into question the integrity of the individual are deemed to be incompatible with the holding of trade union office.

- Section 215 of the Labour Code. This section concerns the formalities for registration and verification of the legality of a trade union. Under the terms of this section, the founders of any occupational trade union are required to deposit their regulations and the list of persons responsible for their administration and management; within a period of 30 days following their deposit, copies of the regulations and the list of persons responsible for the administration and management of the union are transmitted by the labour inspector to the Minister of Labour and the Chief Public Prosecutor; the documents are accompanied by a report prepared by the Labour Inspectorate; the Minister of Labour then has 15 days to issue a receipt granting legal recognition to the union; the Chief Public Prosecutor then has 30 days to verify the regulations and review the situation of each of the officials responsible for the administration and management of the union and to notify the Minister of the Interior, the Minister of Labour and the union leaders concerned of his/her conclusions; any modification to the regulations and any changes to the composition of the officials responsible for the management or administration of the trade union have to be brought to the knowledge of the same authorities and are subject to verification under the same conditions. The Committee firstly wishes to remind the Government that Article 2 of the Convention guarantees the right of workers and employers to establish organizations without previous authorization by the public authorities. It therefore considers that national legislation which requires the deposit of the regulations of organizations is compatible with this provision if it is a mere formality intended to ensure that the regulations are available to the public. Nevertheless, problems of compatibility with the Convention may arise if the registration procedure is lengthy or complicated, or if the rules concerning registration are applied in such a way as to defeat its purpose and the registration authorities make excessive use of their discretionary power. The Committee notes that section 215 of the Labour Code, under which the decision of the Minister of Labour requires not only the deposit by the founders of the trade union of the relevant documents but also a detailed report by the labour inspector, would appear to grant the administration more or less discretionary power in deciding whether or not an organization meets the registration criteria. This situation could amount in practice to denying the right of workers and employers to establish organizations without previous authorization, in contravention of Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to amend, in consultation with the social partners, section 215 of the Labour Code so as to guarantee the right to establish workers' and employers' organizations without previous authorization, remove the provisions which give de facto discriminatory powers to the administration and ensure that the registration procedure is merely a formality.

Finally, the Committee recalls that its previous comments were also concerned with the need for the Government to repeal or amend the following provisions of the legislation:

- Section 5 of the Act on associations. This provision, which requires organizations to obtain authorization prior to their establishment as trade unions, is contrary to Article 2 of the Convention.
- Section 23 of Decree No. 83-099/PR/FP of 10 September 1983. This provision, which confers upon the President of the Republic broad powers to requisition public servants who are indispensable to the life of the nation and the proper operation of essential public services, should be amended in order to restrict the power of requisition to public servants who exercise authority in the name of the State or in essential services in the strict sense of the term.

Noting that the Government displayed a degree of openness during the direct contacts mission by indicating that it was planning a number of amendments and declaring its willingness to receive technical assistance and advice from the Office, the Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary steps as soon as possible to revise and amend the legislative provisions, taking into account the comments reiterated above. It expresses the firm hope that the Government's next report will contain information on the progress made in this respect.

The Committee takes note of the comments dated 26 August 2009 from the ITUC which reiterate matters already examined by the Committee, as well as denouncing persistent acts of anti-union harassment and discrimination and the brutal repression of strike actions. The Committee urges the Government to provide its reply to the ITUC's comments.

Finally, the Committee takes note of the conclusions of the Credentials Committee of the Conference concerning the examination of an objection, in June 2009, concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Djibouti. The Credentials Committee concluded that the Government had not fulfilled its obligations as set out in article 3 of the ILO Constitution because it had not nominated Workers' delegates representing the workers of Djibouti in agreement with the most representative workers' organization. Furthermore, it regretted the absence of any progress, despite the expectations raised in the recommendations of the direct contacts mission of January 2008, as well as the hopes expressed last year, and called upon the Government to guarantee the implementation of a procedure based on objective and transparent criteria for the nomination of the Worker representatives at future sessions of the Conference. To this end, it expected that these criteria will be identified so that consultation with all parties concerned, and particularly with the genuine workers' organizations in Djibouti, which includes the UGDT whose current secretary-general is Mr Mohamed Abdou, could be carried out in an environment respecting the ability of the workers' organizations to act in total independence from the Government, in accordance with Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

In its previous comments, the Committee noted the comments contained in the communications from the Labour Union of Djibouti (UDT), the General Union of Djibouti Workers (UGTD) and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received between 2005 and 2007 denouncing dismissals and acts of discrimination and anti-union interference in the postal and other sectors. In this respect, the Committee requested the Government to order without delay an independent investigation into the alleged acts. The Committee notes that, in a report of May 2008, the Government indicates that the matter was the subject of in-depth discussions with the direct contacts mission which visited Djibouti in 2008, which encouraged all the parties to bring an end to the disputes. The Government also indicated that it would provide information on developments in the situation. The Committee, observing that the Government has not provided any information since then, requests it to indicate the cases referred to which have been resolved and to specify the cases in which the penalties established by the law were imposed when violations of the rights set out in the Convention were found to have been committed.

The Committee notes the comments of the ITUC, dated 26 August 2009, indicating that the ILO mission to Djibouti in January 2008 had offered some hope of an opening, but that the commitments made on that occasion by the Government, including those relating to the reinstatement of workers and trade unionists who suffered abusive dismissal, have not been given effect. The ITUC also denounces the pressure exerted on the Postal Union. Following the dismissal of its Secretary-General and the defection of two members of its executive board, the union had to establish a new executive board headed by Abdourahman Ali Omar, who had been reinstated in his job following suspension. However, the management interrupted the check-off of workers' trade union dues, thereby preventing the union from defending the rights of postal workers. The Committee notes with concern the deterioration in the situation in the postal sector and urges the Government to provide its observations in reply to the ITUC's comments.

The Committee also once again requests the Government to provide a copy of the Decree envisaged under section 282 of the Labour Code, establishing the structure and procedures of the National Joint Committee on Collective Agreements and Wages, and any relevant information on its work.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1957)

In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that the ILO technical assistance mission of April 2009, which had been requested by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, had given rise to a Tripartite Memorandum of Understanding by which the social partners and the Government had agreed to participate in a tripartite symposium to be organized by the ILO to discuss the challenges faced by the country in the application of the Convention, to review the experiences of other member States and to formulate proposals on the measures necessary to give effect to the Committee's comments. The Committee welcomes the fact that a Tripartite Workshop on Social Dialogue, Freedom of Association and Development took place on 26 April 2010, with ILO participation, to address a number of divergences between the legislation, the practice and the Convention. The Committee hopes that the holding of this seminar will constitute an important first step in addressing this long-standing matter.

The Committee notes the discussion during the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2010 on the application of the Convention. The Committee notes in particular the Government's indications during that meeting that it planned to engage in a review of the legislation with the assistance of the ILO in order to ensure full conformity with the Convention. The Committee also notes that the Conference Committee expressed the firm expectation that the Government would elaborate a fast-track programme for ensuring that tangible steps would be taken in the very near future to amend the legislation in order to ensure that all workers may freely form and join the organization of their own choosing and that all forms of Government interference in the activities of workers' organizations, including through legislative reference to the authority of a single trade union in this regard, are eliminated. Finally, the Committee notes that the Conference Committee requested the Government to provide the necessary proposals for amendments, especially to the Trade Union Act, by the end of the year to the ILO for advice on their conformity with the Convention. The Committee regrets that the Government has not yet transmitted any draft amendments in this regard.

The Committee recalls that for several years it has been commenting upon the discrepancies between the Convention and the national legislation, namely Trade Union Act No. 35 of 1976, as amended by Act No. 12 of 1995, and Labour Code No. 12 of 2003, with regard to the following points:

- the institutionalization of a single trade union system under Act No. 35 of 1976 (as amended by Act No. 12 of 1995), and in particular sections 7, 13, 14, 17 and 52;
- the control granted by law to higher level trade union organizations, and particularly the Confederation of Trade Unions, over the nomination and election procedures to the executive committees of trade unions, under the terms of sections 41, 42 and 43 of Act No. 35 (as amended by Act No. 12);
- the control exercised by the Confederation of Trade Unions over the financial management of trade unions, by virtue of sections 62 and 65 of Act No. 35 (as amended by Act No. 12);
- the removal from office of the executive committee of a trade union which has provoked work stoppages or absenteeism in a public service or community services (section 70(2)(b) of Act No. 35 of 1976);
- the requirement of the prior approval of the Confederation of Trade Unions for the organization of strike action, under section 14(i) of the same Act;
- restrictions on the right to strike and recourse to compulsory arbitration in services which are not essential in the strict sense of the term (sections 179, 187, 193 and 194 of the Labour Code); and
- penalties for breaches of section 194 of the Labour Code (section 69(9) of the Code).

The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that Order No. 69 of 2010 has been issued by the Minister of Manpower and Migration on the establishment of a preparatory technical committee composed of legal experts to review Labour Code No. 12 of 2003 and Trade Unions Act No. 35 of 1976, as amended to date, to ensure their conformity with international labour standards. The Committee further notes that pursuant to Order No. 69, the legal experts shall present a report by the end of the year, which will then be submitted for discussion to a tripartite meeting in order to agree on the final versions of the two bills. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that during the review process, due account will be taken of the Committee's comments on the abovementioned issues and trusts that the proposed amendments will be provided to the ILO in the near future for advice on their conformity with the Convention.

The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the progress made on these long-outstanding matters.

Finally, and as specifically requested by the Conference Committee at its meeting in June 2010, the Committee regrets that the Government has still not provided its observations on the 2009 comments submitted by the ITUC concerning the violent repression in April 2008, by the police, of a workers' demonstration in the town of Mahalla, resulting in the death of six workers and the detention of 500 people, including three trade unionists and requests it to do so with its next report.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1954)

In its previous observation, the Committee had noted that the ILO technical assistance mission of April 2009, which had been requested by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, had given rise to a Tripartite Memorandum of Understanding by which the social partners and the Government had agreed to participate in a tripartite symposium to be organized by the ILO to discuss the challenges faced by the country in the application of the Convention, to review the experiences of other member States and to formulate proposals on the measures necessary to give effect to the Committee's comments. The Committee welcomes the fact that a Tripartite Workshop on Social Dialogue, Freedom of Association and Development took place on 26 April 2010, with ILO participation, to address a number of divergences between the legislation, the practice and the Convention. The Committee hopes that the holding of this seminar will constitute an important first step in addressing this long-standing matter.

In its previous observation, the Committee had noted the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on the application of the Convention, in particular the allegations that: (1) the provisions of the 2002 Special Economic Zones Law exempt investment companies newly established in the zones from the legal provisions concerning the organization of labour, and anti-union acts were reported, including pressure on members to leave unions; (2) most workers in the Tenth of Ramadan City Zone were forced to sign letters of resignation before beginning employment so that they could be fired at the employers' convenience; and (3) trade unionists were harassed by the authorities, including in connection with the promotion of union membership, and administrative penalties were imposed on a number of them. The Committee takes note of the Government's replies to the ITUC comments, stating in particular that: (1) pursuant to section 28 of the 2002 Special Economic Zones Act No. 83, the provisions of the Labour Code constitute a minimum limit to what may be agreed upon in individual and collective labour contracts and the Act does not contain any provisions exempting any enterprise subject to its provisions from the laws relating to the organization of labour, such as Labour Code No. 12 of 2003 or Trade Unions Act No. 35 of 1976; and the Ministry of Manpower and Migration investigates any complaint received from any worker concerning pressure to leave the trade union to which they belong and spares no effort to protect the workers' interests and safeguard their rights; (2) section 119 of the Labour Code makes the practice alleged by the ITUC impossible by providing that "the worker's resignation does not count unless it is submitted in writing; the worker who has resigned may withdraw his resignation within a week of the date on which the employer notifies the worker of his acceptance of the resignation in which case the resignation is deemed non-existent", moreover, the Government has engaged in awareness raising on these provisions among all workers covered by the Labour Code, especially in labour-intensive enterprises; and (3) the Labour Code and the Trade Unions Act guarantee the protection of trade union members or workers' representatives from any practices against them and refer the matter to the judicial authority.

Article 4 of the Convention. In its previous observation, the Committee had recalled that it has been making comments for a number of years on various provisions of the Labour Code, as follows:

- as regards section 154 of the Labour Code, under which any clause of a collective agreement contrary to the law on public order or general ethics shall be null and void, the Committee had asked the Government to provide information on the scope of this section and the impact the broad wording of this section might have on the application of the principle of voluntary negotiation, it had also requested the Government to indicate the specific cases in which use had been made in practice of section 154;
- as regards sections 148 and 153 of the Labour Code, the Committee had asked the Government to take the necessary steps to repeal these sections, as they enable higher level organizations to interfere in the negotiation process conducted by lower level organizations. The Committee had noted the Government's indications that the purpose of the participation of higher level organizations in the negotiation process of a union is to support and strengthen the position of smaller unions, and that the application of the Convention is ensured by concluding agreements which apply to all workers belonging to a higher level organization. The Committee recalls that the interference by higher level organizations in the bargaining process undertaken by lower level organizations is incompatible with the autonomy which must be enjoyed by bargaining parties which, as such, must have the right to free and voluntary negotiation of collective agreements;

- as regards sections 179 and 187, in conjunction with sections 156 and 163 of the Labour Code, the Committee had asked the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the Labour Code so that the parties could have recourse to arbitration only by mutual agreement.

The Committee had accordingly requested the Government to take the necessary measures to repeal sections 148 and 153 of the Labour Code and to amend sections 179 and 187, in conjunction with sections 156 and 163 of the Labour Code, so that compulsory arbitration can only be possible for public servants engaged in the administration of the State or in essential services in the strict sense of the term.

Finally, the Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report, that Order No. 69 of 2010 has been issued by the Minister of Manpower and Migration on the establishment of a preparatory technical committee composed of legal experts to review Labour Code No. 12 of 2003 and Trade Unions Act No. 35 of 1976, as amended to date, to ensure their conformity with international labour standards. The Committee further notes that, pursuant to Order No. 69, the legal experts shall present a report by the end of the year, which will then be submitted for discussion to a tripartite meeting in order to agree on the final versions of the two bills. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that during the review process, due account will be taken of the Committee's comments on the abovementioned issues. As requested by the Conference Committee, the Committee trusts that the proposed amendments will be provided to the ILO in the near future for advice on their conformity with the Convention.

The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the progress made on these long-standing matters.

Equatorial Guinea

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received.

The Committee notes the comments from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 24 August 2010, which refer to the application of the Convention and also to the administrative authority's persistent refusal to register the Trade Union of Workers of Equatorial Guinea (UST), the Independent Services Union (SIS), the Teachers' Trade Union Association (ASD) and the Agricultural Workers' Organization (OTC). The Committee recalls that the discretionary power of the competent authority to grant or reject a registration request is tantamount to a requirement for previous authorization, which is not compatible with Article 2 of the Convention (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, para. 74). The Committee therefore urges the Government once again to register without delay those trade unions which have fulfilled the legal requirements and provide information in this respect in its next report.

The Committee again recalls that it has been asking the Government for a number of years to: (i) amend section 5 of Act No. 12/1992, which provides that employees' organizations may be occupational or sectoral – so that workers may, if they so desire, establish enterprise trade unions; (ii) amend section 10 of Act No. 12/1992, which provides that for an occupational association to obtain legal personality it must, inter alia, have a minimum of 50 employees – so as to reduce the number of workers required to a reasonable level; (iii) confirm that, as a result of a revision of the Fundamental Act in 1995 (Act No. 1 of 1995), the right to strike is recognized in public utilities and is exercised under the conditions laid down by law; (iv) provide information on the services deemed to be essential, and on how the minimum services to be ensured are determined, as provided for in section 37 of Act No. 12/1992; and (v) state whether public servants who do not exercise authority in the name of the State enjoy the right to strike (section 58 of the Fundamental Act).

The Committee again urges the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the legislation in order to bring it into full conformity with the provisions of the Convention and to send information in its next report on any measures taken or contemplated in this respect. The Committee expresses the strong hope that the Government will take all possible steps without delay to resume a constructive dialogue with the ILO.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received.

Article 4 of the Convention. Collective bargaining. The Committee notes the comments from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 24 August 2010, which refer once again to the authority's refusal to recognize trade unions and, consequently, to the impossibility of exercising their right to collective bargaining. The Committee notes with concern that no progress has been made despite the time that has passed and the repeated requests that it has made. It emphasizes once again that the existence of trade unions established freely by workers is a prerequisite for the application of the Convention and for exercising the right to collective bargaining. The Committee therefore again urges the Government to take the necessary steps without delay for creating appropriate conditions for the establishment of trade unions which can engage in collective bargaining with a view to regulating conditions of employment.

Article 6. Right of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State to engage in collective bargaining. The Committee notes that, according to the comments made by the ITUC, the right of workers in the public service to establish trade unions has still not been recognized by law, despite the fact that section 6 of Act No. 12/1992 on trade unions and collective labour relations provides that the right to organize of officials in the public administration shall be regulated by a special law. Consequently, the ITUC indicates that the legal framework for collective bargaining continues to be deficient and ambiguous. The Committee urges the Government to supply information on whether the special law has been adopted, whether this law guarantees public servants' right to organize and engage in collective bargaining, and to send detailed information on the application of the Convention with regard to public servants who are not engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee reminds the Government that it may avail itself of technical assistance from the ILO in this respect and expresses the strong hope that it will take all possible steps without delay to resume a constructive dialogue with the ILO.

Eritrea

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 2000)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union discrimination and interference. In its previous comments, the Committee had taken note that section 28(3) of the Labour Proclamation provides for the reinstatement of trade union leaders in cases of unjustified dismissal, but did not contemplate neither the protection against other prejudicial acts nor the protection of anti-union discrimination acts against workers affiliated to a trade union. It has requested the Government to broaden the protection against anti-union discrimination to cover recruitment and all prejudicial acts during the course of employment, including dismissal, transfer, relocation, demotion, deprivation and restrictions of all kinds and requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged in this regard. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that it has envisaged broadening the protection to protect workers against anti-union discrimination. Therefore, the Committee reiterates its previous conclusion and hopes that the Labour Proclamation will be amended accordingly in the near future.

Sanctions applicable in cases of anti-union discrimination or acts of interference. In its previous comments, the Committee had recalled that a fine of 1,200 nafka (ERN), set out in section 156 of the Labour Proclamation, to punish those guilty of anti-union discrimination or acts of interference, did not constitute an adequate protection and had noted the Government's indication that section 692 of the Transitional Penal Code became applicable in cases where an offence was considered severe or repeated. The Committee had requested the Government to indicate the sanctions applicable and to provide copies of penal sentences regarding cases of anti-union discrimination and interference. The Government indicates that the labour courts had not come across sentences regarding cases of anti-union discrimination and interference. The Government also points out that section 691 sanctions "petty offenses" when, by an act or omission, a person infringes the mandatory or prohibitive provisions of a regulation, order or decree lawfully issued by a competent authority. The Committee notes however that this penal provision does not cover specifically the cases of anti-union discrimination acts and interference. Therefore, the Committee requests the Government to take the measures to amend section 156 of the Labour Proclamation in order to provide higher and more dissuasive sanctions to sanction those guilty of anti-union discrimination or acts of interference and requests the Government to indicate the measure taken or envisaged in this respect. The Committee also requests the Government to communicate copies of any penal sentences regarding anti-union discrimination or acts of interference as soon as rendered in the future.

Articles 1, 2, 4 and 6. Domestic workers. Previously, the Committee had expressed the strong hope that the Ministry would issue a regulation in the near future that ensured that domestic employees were entitled to exercise their trade union rights, guaranteed under Conventions Nos 87 and 98. The Committee had noted the Government's statement that domestic employees like all other categories of workers, are entitled to the right to organize and collective bargaining since the promulgation of the Labour Proclamation and that one association of domestic workers has been established. The Committee notes that according to the Government, the Ministry of Labour and Human Welfare, under its power provided in section 40 of the Labour Proclamation, will not refrain from including the rights mentioned in the Convention in the upcoming regulation applicable to domestic employees. In this regard, the Committee once again expresses the firm hope that this regulation will be issued in the near future and will explicitly recognize to domestic workers the rights enshrined in the Convention.

Article 6. Right to collective bargaining in the public sector. The Committee had previously requested the Government to provide specific information concerning the status of the draft Civil Service Proclamation. The Committee notes that according to the Government, the Civil Service Administration has been working on the draft Civil Service Proclamation through a process of participation and interaction and that relevant and salient comments of the participants were integrated in the final draft. The Committee notes that the Government once again reiterates that the drafting of the legal text concerning public servants, which would guarantee the right to organize to civil servants, reached its final stage and would be communicated to the ILO once adopted. In this regard, the Committee once again expresses the hope that the Government will take the necessary measures, in consultation with the social partners, to improve its legislation on public servants in respect of the rights enshrined in the Convention including the right to collective bargaining for public servants not engaged in the administration of the State and requests it to transmit copies of the relevant legislative acts upon their adoption.

Ethiopia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes the communication dated 24 August 2010 submitted by Education International (EI), as well as the Government's reply to the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in 2008. The Committee further notes the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association of June 2010, as regards allegations of serious violations of trade union rights and interference in the internal organization of the Ethiopian Teachers' Association (Case No. 2516).

The Committee notes that the Government indicates, in its reply, that it categorically rejects the allegations of interference in the affairs of independent associations and states that, without the free and unfettered operation of independent associations, the democratization effort in the country will not succeed. The Government's report adds that it has repeatedly explained that the right to form associations was a constitutionally protected freedom that citizens freely exercise, that the 2006 Labour Proclamation upholds this fundamental constitutional right and guarantees to trade unions the right to engage in organized collective bargaining within the scope delineated by its provisions; that the numerous freely functioning trade union and professional associations attest to the fact that the national legislation is in compliance with the Convention; and that the labour law provides unions and associations with a "legal arsenal" to defend themselves against any form of undue intervention. The Committee also notes that the Government indicates that the allegation that the new Charities and Societies Proclamation No. 621/2009 limits the right to strike and collective bargaining is completely without legal or practical foundation; that the conditions for the exercise of the right to strike and collective bargaining are governed by the Labour Proclamation; that unions can pursue their objective through this available option; and that the law provides for a list of essential public services to be maintained during a strike and holds the guilty party accountable in the event that property damage occurs in the course of the exercise of such activities.

Teachers' associations. In its previous comments, the Committee, also referring to the conclusions of the Conference Committee in 2009, had urged the Government to take without delay the necessary measures to ensure the resolution of the registration of the National Association of Ethiopian Teachers (NTA). The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the NTA can request registration from the newly formed Charities and Societies Agency (CSA), established on the basis of the newly published Charities and Societies Proclamation No. 621/2009, and that, if registration is refused by the CSA, the NTA can bring the issue before a court of law, which could establish that the organization was unfairly denied registration. The Committee also notes that the Government's report indicates that, at this stage, before the issues have found legal closure, it is not appropriate for the Government to get involved in this regard, but that, once the NTA is registered, the Government reiterates its assurance that, as required by law, the NTA will enjoy all the entitlements of recognition and services that all legal associations are entitled to receive.

The Committee notes that the EI indicates, in its communication, that, after an unsuccessful attempt by the NTA to be registered with the Ministry of Justice in December 2008, the second attempt to register, in February 2010, has consistently been discouraged verbally by officials of the newly created CSA. According to the EI, three officers of the CSA commented that some of the objectives of the NTA, specifically the task to promote quality education and implementing Education for All and HIV/AIDS prevention programmes, are the sole responsibility and duty of the Government and warned that a union had to stick to only defending the rights of its members. Moreover, the officers of the CSA allegedly instructed the NTA representatives to convince teachers to join the existing teachers' association. On 7 May 2010, the NTA representatives requested the Director-General of the CSA to take the following actions: (i) either order the concerned officers to register NTA and issue certificate without further delay, or inform the NTA in writing of the refusal to register, in accordance with article 3.3; and (ii) provide the NTA with the address of the Charities and Societies Board since no one at the CSA could tell NTA the address of the Board, in order for NTA to be able to appeal grievance. As of 20 August 2010, no official response was notified to NTA representatives. Deeply regretting the time that has elapsed since the NTA first sought registration and recalling that the right to official recognition through legal registration is an essential facet of the right to organize since that is the first step that workers' or employers' organizations must take in order to be able to function efficiently, the Committee urges the Government to take all necessary measures to ensure that the NTA is registered without further delay so that teachers may fully exercise their right to form organizations for the furthering and defence of teachers' occupational interests, and to provide information on the progress made in this respect in its next report.

As to the Charities and Societies Proclamation No. 621/2009, which was published on 13 February 2009, the Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the law was promulgated after extensive public discussions involving all stakeholders, and entered into force after the expiry of the period of time which was given to associations and various charities and societies to align themselves with its requirements. The Government's report adds: that the Charities and Societies Proclamation aims at enhancing the participation of civil society organizations in developmental efforts of the country; that it clearly defines and regulates charities and societies and provides the necessary safeguards and due process in the framework of democratization efforts; and that no trade union or related association raised complaints on being aggrieved or restrained by this new law. The Committee notes that, according to its preamble, the Charities and Societies Proclamation is based on the need to "enact a law in order to ensure the realization of citizens' right to association enshrined in the Constitution" and that the abovementioned CSA is the newly established state agency for the registration of associations. Nevertheless, the Committee notes with concern that the Charities and Societies Proclamation organizes an ongoing and close monitoring of the organizations established on its basis and gives governmental authorities great discretionary powers to interfere in the registration, internal administration and dissolution of the concerned organizations with respect to those falling within its scope, which appear to encompass civil servants, including teachers.

The Committee notes that a number of provisions of the Charities and Societies Proclamation raise issues of compatibility with the Convention:

- the Charities and Societies Proclamation establishes a distinction between the organizations which are required to register, on the basis of the nationality of their members and the amount of funds they receive from foreign sources (article 2(2) and (3)); and, pursuant to article 14(5), only "Ethiopian Charities and Societies" – that is organizations all of whose members are Ethiopians, generate income from Ethiopia, are wholly controlled by Ethiopians and receive not more than 10 per cent of their funds from foreign sources – can take part in activities linked with the advancement of human and democratic rights, the promotion of the rights of the disabled and children's rights, the promotion of conflict resolution or reconciliation and the promotion of the efficiency of the justice and law enforcement services. The Committee understands that workers' and employers' organizations the members of which "reside" in the country – who are not all nationals – that are receiving more than 10 per cent of their funds from foreign sources and whose purpose is to defend the social and economic rights and interests of their members would not be permissible under the Act and would not be able to carry out their activities in the defence of the interests of their members;
- the Charities and Societies Proclamation authorizes the CSA to interfere in a range of administrative, financial and accounting issues concerning the internal functioning of the organizations, either explicitly or by using general wording that leaves a great margin of appreciation to the supervisory body through, inter alia, the following provisions: (i) pursuant to article 84(1) and (2), the CSA may "from time to time" institute inquiries with regard to charities or societies, either generally or for particular purposes and for the purposes of any such inquiry, the CSA "may by order" require the organization to furnish accounts and statements in writing, with respect to any matter in question at the inquiry, to furnish copies of documents in his custody or under his control, or to attend at a specified time and place and give evidence or produce documents; (ii) pursuant to article 85(1)(a), the CSA may, by order, require any charity or society or an employee thereof to furnish orally or in writing any information in her/his possession which relates to any charity or society; (iii) pursuant to article 86, any society shall notify the CSA in writing of the time and place of any meeting of its General Assembly, not later than seven working days prior to such meeting; (iv) pursuant to article 88(1), any organization shall allocate not less than 70 per cent of the expenses in the budget year for the implementation of its purposes and an amount not exceeding 30 per cent for its administrative activities; (v) pursuant to article 90, where, "at any time", the CSA, upon an inquiry with respect to any organization, "is satisfied that there is or has been any misconduct or mismanagement" in the administration of the organization and that it is "necessary to act for the purpose of protecting the property" of the organization, the CSA may, inter alia, suspend the officer responsible for the misconduct or mismanagement; and (vi) an organization may not establish a branch, change its name, place of work or amend its rules without giving prior notice to the CSA (articles 72–73) and shall not use any symbol without having it previously registered by the CSA (article 74);

The Committee recalls that the right of workers and employers to establish organizations of their own choosing, without interference by the public authorities includes the right to freely decide on the structure and composition of the organization, as well as autonomy and financial independence; that legislative provisions regulating in detail the internal functioning of workers' and employers' organizations pose a serious risk of interference by public authorities; that such provisions should simply establish an overall framework in which the greatest possible autonomy is left to the organizations; that there is no infringement of these rights if, for example, the supervision is limited to the obligation of submitting periodic financial reports; that problems of compatibility with the Convention arise when the law requires that certain financial operations – such as the receipt of funds from abroad – be approved by the public authorities as well as when the administrative authority has the power to examine the books and other documents of an organization, conduct an investigation and demand information at any time; and that both the substance and the procedure of such verifications should always be subject to review by the competent judicial authority affording every guarantee of impartiality and objectivity (General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraphs 78, 107, 124–126 and 135).

- as regards the dissolution of organizations, pursuant to article 92(2)(e) of the Charities and Societies Proclamation, the licence of any organization shall be cancelled, inter alia, “where it commits a crime by violating the provisions of the criminal code or that of the Proclamation”; noting that, pursuant to article 93, an organization may be dissolved by the CSA when its licence has been cancelled, it would thus appear that any violation, by an organization, of any provision of the Proclamation, including minor administrative requirements, may lead to the cancellation of its licence and to its dissolution;
- no suspensive effect is provided to the appeal procedure, since, pursuant to article 104(4), any organization in an appeal process, “in relation to registration or cancellation, shall be deemed not registered or cancelled until the final decision is made by the concerned authority”.

The Committee recalls that the dissolution and suspension of trade union organizations constitute extreme forms of interference by the authorities in the activities of organizations, and should therefore be accompanied by all the necessary guarantees; that the organizations affected by such measures must have the right of appeal to an independent and impartial judicial body; and that the administrative decision should not take effect until a final decision is handed down (General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 185 and 188).

- as regards the registration process, the Charities and Societies Proclamation makes the acquisition of legal personality a prerequisite for the existence of an organization (articles 56(1) and 64(2)); moreover, the obligation to register with the CSA also applies to organizations that had already been registered before the publication of the Proclamation (article 111); in addition, the licence of the organization has to be renewed every three years (article 76(1)); and the wording used by article 69(2) would appear to allow the CSA to refuse to register an organization on a discretionary basis, since, according to this provision, the CSA shall refuse to register a charity or society where the proposed organization “is likely to be used for unlawful purposes or for purposes prejudicial to public peace, welfare or good order”.

The Committee recalls that when legislation makes the acquisition of legal personality a prerequisite for the existence and functioning of an organization, the conditions for acquiring legal personality must not be such that they amount to a de facto requirement for previous authorization to establish an organization, which would be tantamount to calling into question the application of Article 2 of the Convention (General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 76);

- as to the sanctions and penalties, noting that the Charities and Societies Proclamation requires the organizations to fulfil a large number of requirements – ranging from minor administrative demands to structural clauses and detailed accounting – the Committee understands that any failure to adhere to any of these provisions may constitute a criminal offence, since, pursuant to article 102(1), “any person who violates the provisions of the Proclamation shall be punishable in accordance with the provisions of the Criminal Code”; in addition to prison terms, heavy fines can also apply when any organization fails, inter alia, to keep its books of accounts, to record money received, its source and the amount expended, or fails to submit an annual statement of account, or fails to allocate not less than 70 per cent of its expenses for the implementation of its purposes and not exceeding 30 per cent for its administrative activities (article 102(2)); in addition, any employee who participates in the “criminal acts” established under article 102(2) shall, “without prejudice to the applicability of the relevant provisions of the Criminal Code prescribing a penalty of imprisonment”, be punishable with a fine (article 102(3)).

In these circumstances, taking into account the broad discretionary powers provided by the Charities and Societies Proclamation No. 621/2009 to public authorities, in particular through the establishment of the CSA, to interfere in the right to organize of workers and employers, as well as the requirement in the Proclamation that the funds of an association received from foreign sources not exceed 10 per cent, contrary to the right of workers’ organizations to organize their administration, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures, without delay, to ensure that the Charities and Societies Proclamation is not applicable to the workers’ and employer’s organizations covered by the Convention and that such organizations are ensured effective recognition through legislation which is in full conformity with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on all the steps taken in this regard and reminds the Government that it may avail itself of the technical assistance of the ILO in this respect.

Civil servants. Furthermore, in its previous observation, the Committee had recalled that it had requested the Government to take measures to amend the Civil Servant Proclamation, so as to ensure the right of civil servants, including teachers in public schools, to form and join trade unions. The Committee had noted that the Government indicated that this right is enshrined under article 42 of the Constitution and that government employees whose work compatibility allows for it and who are below a certain level of responsibility have the right to form associations to improve their conditions of employment and economic well-being. The Committee had also noted that the Government had expressed to all relevant bodies that it shall achieve full compliance gradually by preparing the necessary conditions and the capacity of the country to shoulder the full extent of this right.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates, in its report, that it is important to re-emphasize the fundamental fact that the Constitution explicitly provides that every person, including every civil servant, has the right to form associations for any cause or purpose; that civil servants with grievances in respect of their conditions of work are entitled to resort to legal mechanisms of redress under the legislation governing the civil service and other legal recourses, including the Office of the Ombudsperson; that it reiterates its position that there was not, nor could there be, any difference on whether civil servants should be able to form associations; and that the only difference is the timing. The Government's report indicates that it is the Government's assessment that the country is not ready to fully cater for such a framework; that this is the only explanation why the civil service legislation did not yet provide a separate association in the civil service; that as part of the democratization process in the country, the Government is fully engaged in implementing the civil service reform programme designed to provide efficient and speedy service to citizens; that at the present juncture, the Government has not developed the capacity to engage in a fully fledged collective bargaining process with civil servants; and that this is a matter to be presented for consideration by the legislature once the reform programme is successfully implemented and the necessary national capacity is in place. The Committee recalls the importance of ensuring that public servants, like all other workers, without distinction whatsoever, have the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, without previous authorization, for the promotion and defence of their occupational interests. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the freedom of association rights of civil servants, including teachers in the public sector, are fully guaranteed, and to provide information on the progress made in this respect in its next report.

Furthermore, in its previous comments, the Committee had urged the Government to conduct a full and independent inquiry without delay into the allegations made by the ITUC and EI, relating to arrests of trade unionists, their torture and mistreatment while in detention, and continuing intimidation and interference. The Committee had noted the Government's statement that all allegations that are presented with credible evidence will be fully investigated by constitutional bodies including the courts, the Ethiopian Human Rights Commission, the Office of the Ombudsperson, or by a mechanism approved by the House of Peoples' Representatives. The Committee notes that the Government further indicates in its report that, on 8 May 2009, the second Criminal Bench of the Federal High Court found Mr Meqcha Mengistu guilty and sentenced him to three years' imprisonment; that he was released after receiving a pardon and that Ms Wubit Ligamo, who the Government denies was mistreated while in prison, was also released. While welcoming these releases, the Committee deeply regrets that the Government has never provided any information on the investigations expected into the allegations of torture and maltreatment of the detained trade unionists.

Labour Proclamation (2003). Finally, the Committee recalls that for several years it has been expressing its concern over the Labour Proclamation (2003), which falls short of ensuring full application of the Convention. In particular, the Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government:

- to ensure the right to organize of the following categories of workers who are excluded, by section 3, from the scope of application of the Labour Proclamation: workers whose employment relations arise out of a contract concluded for the purpose of upbringing, treatment, care, rehabilitation, education, training (other than apprenticeship); workers under contract of personal service for non-profit-making purposes; managerial employees, as well as employees of state administration; judges and prosecutors, who were governed by special laws;
- to delete air transport and urban bus services from the list of essential services in which strike action is prohibited (section 136(2));
- to amend its legislation so as to ensure that, except in situations concerning essential services in the strict sense of the term, acute national crisis and public servants exercising authority in the name of the State, recourse to compulsory arbitration is allowed only upon the request of both parties;
- to amend section 158(3), according to which the strike vote should be taken by the majority of the workers concerned in a meeting in which at least two-thirds of the members of the trade union were present, so as to lower the quorum required for a strike ballot; and
- to ensure that the provisions of the Labour Proclamation which, as noted above, restrict the right of workers to organize their activities, are not invoked to cancel an organization's registration pursuant to section 120(c) until they have been brought into conformity with the provisions of the Convention.

The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures, without delay, to bring the legislation and practice into full conformity with the Convention, and to provide detailed information in its next report on the progress made thereon, as well as on the time frame for such action.

Greece

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee refers to its comments under the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), with regard to the observations communicated by the Greek General Confederation of Labour (GSEE) with the support of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the European Trade Union Confederation (ETUC) on the impact of the measures introduced in the framework of the mechanism to support the Greek economy, on the application of the Convention.

The Committee will examine these comments, along with the Government's observations thereto, as well as its report due in 2011, at its next session. In the meantime, the Committee requests the Government to monitor the impact of these measures on the full exercise of the rights under the Convention and to provide information in this respect with its next report.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes that in a communication dated 29 July 2010 the Greek General Confederation of Labour (GSEE) submitted urgent comments with regard to the legislative measures implemented or to be implemented by the end of 2010 by the Greek Government in the framework of the mechanism to support the Greek economy (the GSEE refers to this mechanism as the "loan mechanism"). The International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the European Trade Union Confederation (ETUC) expressed their support for these comments in communications dated 9 August and 22 September 2010, respectively. In a communication dated 25 November 2010, the Government indicates that its reply is being finalized and will be communicated to the Committee as soon as possible, the delay being due to the complexity of the issues and the consequent need for involvement and coordination of many co-competent agencies.

The Committee notes that on 5 May 2010, the Greek Parliament adopted Act No. 3845/2010 (FEK A'65/6-5-2010) on "Measures to implement a mechanism to support the Greek economy by the Member States of the Euro area and the International Monetary Fund". The Act contains as Appendices III and IV, a "Memorandum of Economic and Financial Policies" and a "Memorandum of Understanding on Specific Economic Policy Conditionality" which contain time-bound commitments set up by the Ministry of Finance, with the participation of the European Commission, the European Central Bank and the International Monetary Fund and communicated in letters by the Ministry of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Greece to the President of the Eurogroup, the European Commission and the European Central Bank and to the International Monetary Fund.

The Committee also notes the adoption on 8 July 2010, of Act No. 3863/2010 on the "New Social Security System and relevant provisions" (FEK A'115) in order to implement certain of the time-bound commitments made in the two Memoranda attached to Act No. 3845/2010 in the area of structural policies on strengthening labour markets. In addition, on 5 March 2010, prior to the creation of the mechanism to support the Greek economy, the Parliament had adopted Act No. 3833/2010 (FEK A'40/15-3-2010) on the "Protection of the national economy – Emergency measures to tackle the fiscal crisis".

The GSEE criticizes section 2(7) of Act No. 3845/2010, as a result of which the national general collective agreement will no longer function as a minimum wage setting mechanism since branch and enterprise level agreements will be able to deviate from the terms of the sectoral agreements and the national general collective agreement. The GSEE notes that this provision dismantled a solid machinery of collective bargaining which had been functioning smoothly and effectively for 20 years as a result of a "Social Pact" endorsed unanimously in 1990 by all political parties and empowered by the consensus of the most representative employers' and workers' organizations following intense social dialogue. According to the previous system introduced by Act No. 1876/1990, the national general collective agreement took precedence over all other collective agreements, applied to all private sector workers in the Greek territory regardless of affiliation to a trade union, and bound all employers throughout the country.

The GSEE also objects to the exceptions introduced in the application of the national general collective agreement to young workers (of 18–24 years) and children (of 15–18 years) and the authorization granted to the Minister of Labour (in section 2(9)(e) and (f) of Act No. 3845/2010) to regulate through Presidential Decrees their working conditions, thus excluding this vulnerable group of workers from the scope of the minimum standards of wages and working conditions, which had so far been set through the national general collective agreement. It notes in particular, that newly hired young workers up to 24 years of age and children of 15–18 years will be remunerated at, respectively, 80 and 70 per cent of the minimum basic wage, as this is established in the national general collective agreement, for a period of 12 months (sections 2(6) of Act No. 3845/2010 and 74(9) of Act No. 3863/2010).

Furthermore, the GSEE objects to the permanent (and not temporarily restricted) drastic reductions in wages introduced twice in 2010 in the wider public sector including for employees under private law contracts (employed in local self-government and public enterprises) despite the provisions of the relevant collective agreements in force (sections 1(2) and 1(5) of Act No. 3833 and sections 3(1), (4), (6) and (8) of Act No. 3845/2010). The GSEE claims that collective agreements have been prohibited in the wider public sector by sections 1(2), (5) and 3(5) of Act No. 3833 and 3(8) of Act No. 3845/2010, which provide that all provisions in collective agreements which are contrary to the Acts in question are cancelled and superseded.

The GSEE also draws attention to various time-bound commitments introduced in the two Memoranda without any consultations with the social partners which in its view, constitute in and of themselves a violation of the autonomy of the bargaining parties and designate a pretextual process of dialogue on foregone conclusions and binding commitments that are already part of national legislation.

Finally, the GSEE criticizes the absence of consultations on the adoption of the abovementioned legislative measures which, according to the GSEE, does not signal a political will and commitment to engage in social dialogue in good faith nor does it manifest a sincere intention to take into account the views of the GSEE on these significant matters.

The GSEE concludes that Acts Nos 3833/2010, 3845/2010 and 3863/2010 lead to workers' disempowerment in the face of the combined spill-over effect of lay-offs, wage freezes and the abolition of the minimum standards of wages, negate the State's fundamental obligation to provide and protect decent work, violate the very essence of individual and social rights and endanger social peace and cohesion. The GSEE emphasizes that the measures in question are permanent and irreversible, notwithstanding the specific time frame and limited duration of the loan mechanism; are disproportionate, socially unjust and discriminatory vis-à-vis workers, especially the most vulnerable; have been adopted without examining sufficiently other well-weighed and more appropriate alternatives; are not quantifiable and their scope has no perceivable causal relationship with the pursued aim of implementing the stability programme; are not accompanied by adequate and concrete safeguards to protect the living standard of workers and support vulnerable groups in addressing the combined effect of economic austerity measures and the economic crisis; have had a serious and direct impact in weakening the position of GSEE during the collective negotiations that began in January 2010 for the conclusion of the new national general collective agreement.

The Committee must emphasize the importance of holding full and frank consultations with the employers' and workers' organizations on the revision of collective bargaining machinery, in accordance with the principle of the autonomy of the parties to the collective bargaining process and in light of the long-ranging implications of such revision for the standard of living of workers. Furthermore, it must recall that as a general matter, if, as part of its stabilization policy, a government considers that wage rates cannot be settled freely through collective bargaining, such a restriction should be imposed as an exceptional measure and only to the extent that it is necessary, without exceeding a reasonable period, and it should be accompanied by adequate safeguards to protect workers' living standards. The Committee will examine the comments by the GSEE, along with the Government's reply and the Government's regular report which is due in 2011 it at its next session; the latter should also address the comments previously made by the Committee (see observation 2009/80th Session).

The Committee finally notes that as indicated by the GSEE, the revision of the collective bargaining machinery may have a wider impact on the observance of a range of ILO Conventions ratified by Greece, including the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95), the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), the Labour Administration Convention, 1978 (No. 150), the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154), and the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156).

In light of the complexity and pervasiveness of the measures adopted in the framework of the support mechanism, which touch upon a number of ILO Conventions ratified by Greece, the Committee invites the Government to avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office and to accept a high-level mission to facilitate a comprehensive understanding of the issues, before the examination by the Committee of the impact of the measures in question on the application of this Convention, as well as other Conventions ratified by Greece.

Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154) (ratification: 1996)

The Committee refers to its comments under the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), with regard to the observations communicated by the Greek General Confederation of Labour (GSEE) with the support of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the European Trade Union Confederation (ETUC) on the impact of the measures introduced in the framework of the mechanism to support the Greek economy, on the application of the Convention.

The Committee will examine these comments, along with the Government's observations thereto, as well as its report, at its next session. In the meantime, the Committee requests the Government to monitor the impact of these measures on the full exercise of the rights under the Convention and to provide information in this respect with its next report.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2011.]

Guatemala

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1952)

The Committee notes the Government's report, the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in 2010 and the 11 cases before the Committee on Freedom of Association (Cases Nos 2203, 2241, 2341, 2361, 2445, 2609, 2673, 2708, 2709, 2768 and 2811). In its previous observation, the Committee took note of the high-level mission which visited the country in April 2008 and of the tripartite agreement signed during the mission with a view to improving implementation of the Convention. It also noted the high-level mission undertaken from 16 to 20 February 2009 and the technical assistance missions of 3 January 2009 and a final mission to provide assistance to the Tripartite Commission in formulating the road map to address the measures requested by the Committee on the Application of Standards (this mission took place from 16 to 20 November 2009). The Committee noted that in the end there was no consensus between the social partners and that the Government prepared the road map on its own. The Committee notes that the Government states in its report that in April 2010 a training course was held on international labour standards for staff of the Attorney-General's Office, judges, magistrates, and staff of the Human Rights Ombudsman's Office and of the Ministry of Labour, with ILO technical assistance. The Committee notes that the Government has agreed to the mission, requested in June 2010 by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, involving the visit of an important and recognized personality with high-level ILO support to examine outstanding issues and make recommendations. The Committee notes the Government's suggestion that the mission be held in early 2011.

Acts of violence against trade unionists

For several years, in its observations the Committee has noted acts of violence against trade unionists that have gone unpunished, and has asked the Government to send information on developments in this regard.

The Committee notes that, at the proposal of a high-level mission in 2008, the Tripartite Commission approved an agreement to eradicate violence, under the terms of which there are to be evaluations of: "(1) institutional action, including the most recent activities, and in particular the special protection measures to prevent acts of violence against trade unionists who are under threat; and (2) of the measures that are being taken (increases in the budget and in the number of investigators) to guarantee that effective investigations are conducted with sufficient resources so as to be able to elucidate the crimes committed against trade unionists and to identify those responsible".

In its previous observation, the Committee noted that both the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the Indigenous and Rural Workers Trade Union Movement of Guatemala for the Defence of Workers' Rights (MSICG) refer in their comments of 2009 to serious acts of violence against trade union leaders and members during the period 2008–09, and report a climate of fear and intimidation the aim of which is to undermine existing trade unions and prevent the establishment of new ones. Both organizations also emphasize the deficiencies in the labour inspection system and the crisis in the legal system. The Committee expressed the hope that, in the context of the tripartite agreement concluded during the high-level mission, all the matters raised, as well as the comments of the ITUC, the Trade Union Confederation of Guatemala (UNSI TRAGUA) and the MSICG will be examined and addressed in a tripartite context by the Government and the social partners in the framework of the Tripartite Commission on International Labour Affairs, and the mechanism for rapid intervention in cases. The Committee notes with regret that there is nothing in the Government's report to suggest that a tripartite review of these matters has been held, and once again strongly requests the Government to take all available measures to ensure that these issues are examined without delay by the abovementioned Tripartite Commission.

The Committee notes the extensive comments of 30 August 2010 on the application of the Convention, submitted by the MSICG. It notes that according to the MSICG, in 2009 and 2010 there have been numerous acts of violence against trade union leaders and trade unionists, ranging from murders (47 since 2007, seven of them in 2010), death threats and acts of intimidation, to abductions, torture or armed assault (with guns or knives); there has also been unauthorized entry of homes of trade unionists and trade union premises. According to the MSICG, in some cases the State did not authorize the security measures requested by the persons threatened and the Office of the Public Prosecutor is not investigating all the cases since some complaints have not even been entered in its database. The MSICG also cites instances of obstacles or administrative hurdles to the establishment or running of trade unions, and of unions being destroyed while organizing. More than 20,000 public sector workers have no employment relationship but a civil contract for professional services and, hence, no trade union rights. Furthermore, trade union activity has been criminalized, with penal action being brought against trade unionists for holding peaceful demonstrations and attacks on trade unions in anti-union publications or through smear campaigns. According to the MSICG, there have also been numerous instances of trade unionists being transferred, dismissed or removed from office on anti-union grounds; there are also acts of interference by employers. Furthermore, to the detriment of existing unions, the authorities have promoted "parallel" workers' organizations that are under their control and it is the latter that send delegates to the Tripartite Commission though they have little claim to representativeness. As to legal action, the MSICG emphasizes that slow proceedings with long delays continue to be a problem and that the legal reforms requested by the ILO have not been adopted. Lastly, the MSICG points out that this anti-union climate is reflected in the membership rate (2.2 per cent of the economically active population, of which the public sector accounts for 87.5 per cent).

The Committee observes that many of the assertions in the MSICG's communication were submitted to the Committee on Freedom of Association in its meetings of November 2009 and 2010. In its conclusions, the Committee on Freedom of Association noted with grave concern that the allegations presented in this case are extremely serious and include numerous murders of union leaders and members (16), one disappearance, acts of violence (sometimes also against the relatives of union members), threats, physical harassment, intimidation, the rape of a unionist's family member, obstacles to granting legal status to unions, the dissolution of a union, criminal proceedings for carrying out trade union activities, major institutional failures with regard to labour inspection and the functioning of the judicial authorities that have created a situation of impunity in labour matters (for example, excessive delays, a lack of independence, failure to comply with reinstatement orders issued by the courts) and in criminal matters (see 355th Report, Case No. 2609, paragraphs 858 et seq.).

The Committee is bound to note that, in terms of violence against trade unionists, the failures in the functioning of the penal justice system and the impunity of offenders, the situation continues to grow worse. The high-level mission of February 2009 noted that in recent years, despite the increase in violence against trade unionists (according to information from government officials), there have been no effective trials or convictions. The high-level mission heard testimony of the general lack of independence of the judiciary and government bodies as regards criminal cases. The Government informed the high-level mission that the situation of violence was generalized and denied any state policy against the trade union movement.

The Committee had noted that the high-level mission of February 2009 reported that a significant increase was needed in the capacity and budget of the Office of the Prosecutor General of the Nation, allowing the number of prosecutors and investigators to be increased substantially; the mission suggested that additional resources be allocated to existing programmes for the protection of trade unionists (44 trade unionists currently benefit from protection measures) and witness protection programmes, and that these programmes be properly coordinated. The high-level mission was of the view that measures should be taken actively to discourage any stigmatization of trade unions and the trade union movement that associates trade union activities with criminal acts. The high-level mission reported a very low membership rate and few collective agreements. According to the MSICG's comments, this situation has not changed.

The Committee requests the Government to reply in detail to the MSICG's comments of 2010. The Committee notes the statements made by the Government to the Committee on the Application of Standards to the effect that 30 new inspectors have been recruited to add to the strength of the labour inspectorate, that 70 unions and 45 collective labour accords were registered in 2009 and that most of the murders reported were unrelated to trade union activities.

The Committee wishes to refer to the conclusions drawn by the Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2010, which read as follows:

The Committee noted that the Committee of Experts continued to raise with concern the following issues: numerous serious acts of violence, including murders and threats against trade union members; the stigmatization of trade unions; and legislative provisions and practices that were not in conformity with the rights set out in the Convention. The Committee of Experts had also noted the ineffectiveness of criminal procedures in relation to acts of violence, excessive delays in the judicial procedures and the lack of independence of the judicial authorities which was giving rise to a serious situation of impunity.

The Committee noted the indication by the Government representative that the situation of violence and impunity was generalized and did not exclusively affect the trade union movement. The Government had requested the support of the United Nations to combat impunity and the International Commission against Impunity in Guatemala (CICIG) had been established for that purpose. The Government had requested reports to determine whether or not the murders of trade unionists referred to were due to reasons related to trade union activities. The Government had on many occasions requested ILO technical assistance in relation to all of the problems raised, including violence, impunity and the legislative changes requested, as well as the drawing up of the roadmap. The Government representative stated that tripartite social dialogue had been taking place in the National Tripartite Commission and that four tripartite dialogue round tables had been created at the regional level. He indicated that, following the latest ILO high-level mission, inter-institutional coordination mechanisms had been strengthened. In addition, action had been undertaken for the reinstatement of workers in export processing zones. Training activities had been carried out and the decision had been taken to establish two labour training schools. He stated that, although measures had been taken to reinforce the labour inspection services and the unit in the ministry responsible for relations with the ILO, further technical assistance from the ILO was needed.

The Committee noted that this was an important case that had been discussed for many years and that the Government had received numerous technical assistance missions with a view to bringing the law and practice into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee noted with deep concern that the situation of violence and impunity appeared to have worsened and recalled the importance of guaranteeing on an urgent basis that workers were able to carry out their trade union activities in a climate free from fear, threats and violence. It noted further with concern that the Commissioner of the CICIG resigned on 7 June 2010. The Committee urged the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the effective operation of schemes for the protection of trade unionists and defenders of freedom of association and other human rights.

The Committee noted with concern that the Government had not shown sufficient political will to take action to combat violence against trade union leaders and members and to combat impunity. The Committee emphasized the need to make substantial progress in sentencing in relation to acts of violence against trade unionists and in ensuring that, not only the direct authors of the crime, but also the instigators were punished. The Committee requested the Government to intensify its efforts to bring an end to impunity, including by considerably increasing the budgetary resources allocated to the judiciary, the prosecutors, the police and the labour inspectorate.

Also observing with concern the generalized climate of violence, the Committee recalled that freedom of association could not be exercised in a climate where personal safety and basic civil liberties were not guaranteed. The Committee urged the Government to ensure simple and prompt recourse or any other effective recourse to competent courts or tribunals for protection against acts that were in violation of fundamental rights.

The Committee points out that in the road map it prepared at the request of the Committee on the Application of Standards in 2009, the Government referred to the need to pay greater attention to following up, investigating and concluding cases of violence against trade unionists and that affirmative action was accordingly needed in the interests both of effective and periodical reporting to the Committee on Freedom of Association and of inter-institutional coordination allowing relevant information to be exchanged and brought to the attention of the ILO supervisory bodies. The Government stated its intention of strengthening the Ombuds Unit (unidad de procuración) of the Directorate of International Affairs by appointing qualified staff to deal exclusively with these issues, endowed with the necessary resources to perform their duties and respond immediately to the particular circumstances of each and every case under investigation. In addition, the Government wished to draw up an annual schedule of meetings between the Ministry of Labour (Ombuds Unit of International Labour Affairs) and the Office of the Attorney-General in order to have a framework for ongoing work between the two institutions. Furthermore, the Directorate of International Labour Affairs will draw up an inventory of cases already concluded so as to bring them to the attention of the Committee on Freedom of Association. Furthermore, on the matter of the inter-institutional coordination, the Government stated that the Multi-Institutional Labour Committee for Industrial Relations in Guatemala is being reactivated and will draw up a list of entities that have not yet been included but that are closely involved with these issues.

The Committee notes that in its report the Government states that it is ready and willing to give effect to the content of the Convention. It indicates in this connection that:

- the Ombuds Unit of the Directorate of International Affairs has been reinforced for the purpose of strengthening the ILO supervisory bodies and meeting their requirements thanks to the appointment as from April 2010 of an attorney-adviser and an ombudswoman, which has eased the flow of information on cases reported. Specifically, since then, 127 written requests were sent between April and August 2010, seeking information from various prosecution services of the Office of the Attorney-General, and from magistrates courts, courts of first instance and appeals chambers of labour courts, the Office of the Ombudsman, the General Inspectorate of Labour and the technical and legal advisory departments of the Ministry of Labour and Social Insurance, concerning complaints lodged by workers and trade union organizations. On the basis of this information, the Government sent the Committee on Freedom of Association 37 reports allowing action to be taken on specific objections raised in the cases;
- assistance from magistrates of the Supreme Court of Justice was obtained at the 99th Session of the International Labour Conference, held in Geneva from 2 to 18 June 2010, the aim being to enable a judicial body to become acquainted at first hand with the application of Convention No. 87 and complaints to the Government of Guatemala on violations of that Convention; and
- a request was made to the Attorney-General and the Council of the Attorney-General's Office in November 2009, and reiterated in January 2010, to hold a special meeting with the Tripartite Commission on International Labour Affairs in order to address the topic "Ensuring effective investigation and trial of those responsible for acts of violence and threats against trade unionists" and to secure "progress in the establishment and strengthening of the public prosecution service for crimes against trade unionists", which has not as yet been held because selection of a new Public Prosecutor is still pending.

The Committee once again draws the Government's attention to the principle that a genuinely free trade union movement cannot develop in a climate of violence and intimidation; freedom of association can only be exercised in conditions in which fundamental rights, and in particular those relating to human life and personal safety, are fully respected and guaranteed; the rights of workers' and employers' organizations can only be exercised in a climate that is free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind against the leaders and members of these organizations, and it is for governments to ensure that this principle is respected. The Committee also points out that excessive delays in proceedings and the absence of judgments against the guilty parties creates, in practice, a situation of impunity, which reinforces the climate of violence and insecurity, and which is extremely damaging to the exercise of trade union rights.

In view of the foregoing, although it has been informed that the Government has sent replies to the Committee on Freedom of Association regarding the cases that depend on the proper working of the Multi-Institutional Committee and on Parliament's willingness – according to the Government – to increase budgets in the legal system, the Committee concludes with regret that the Government has not demonstrated sufficient political will to combat violence against trade union leaders and trade unionists and to combat impunity. The Committee observes that, according to the Government's report, the meeting that the Attorney General was requested to hold with the national Tripartite Commission has not taken place. The Committee expresses deep concern at the lack of significant progress, particularly in view of the repeated ILO missions and the very clear and specific recommendations made by the ILO's supervisory bodies. It is particularly concerned that the Government has provided no comprehensive information and up-to-date statistics on acts of violence against trade unionists, the stages reached in criminal trials and the identification and conviction of offenders; nor has it provided information on any increase in budgets for the state bodies responsible for combating violence and impunity.

The Committee once again firmly requests the Government: (i) to ensure the protection of trade unionists under threat of death; (ii) convey to the Public Prosecutor and the Supreme Court of Justice its deep concern at the slowness and inefficiency of the justice system and its recommendations concerning the need to elucidate murders and crimes committed against trade unionists so as to punish the perpetrators; (iii) to ensure the allocation of sufficient resources to these objectives with the consequent increase in human and material resources, to ensure coordination between the various state bodies who may be called upon to intervene in the judicial system, and to ensure training for investigators; and (iv) to give priority to these matters in government policy. The Committee invites the Government to have recourse to ILO technical assistance to resolve the serious problem of impunity for crimes against trade unionists.

Lastly, the Committee again expresses its deep concern at the acts of violence against trade union leaders and members and reminds the Government that trade union rights can be exercised only in a climate that is free of violence. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take all necessary measures to guarantee full respect for the human rights of trade unionists and will continue to apply the protection machinery to all trade unionists who so request. It also requests the Government to take the necessary steps without delay to conduct the necessary investigations to identify those responsible for acts of violence against trade union leaders and members so that they are prosecuted and punished in accordance with the law. The Committee requests the Government to report on all developments in this regard. The Committee expresses its concern that the information provided by the Government refers only exceptionally to cases in which those responsible have been identified and punished, and emphasizes the need for considerable reinforcement of the criminal justice system.

Legislative problems

The Committee has for several years been commenting on the following provisions, which raise problems of consistency with the Convention:

- restrictions on the establishment of organizations in full freedom (the need to have 50 per cent + 1 of those working in the occupation to establish industry trade unions, under section 215(c) of the Labour Code) and delays in the registration of trade unions or the refusal to register them;
- restrictions on the right to elect trade union leaders in full freedom (they need to be of Guatemalan origin and to be a worker in the enterprise or economic activity in order to be elected as a trade union leader, under sections 220 and 223 of the Labour Code);
- restrictions on the right of workers' organizations to organize their activities freely (under section 241 of the Labour Code, strikes are declared not by the majority of those casting votes, but by a majority of the workers); the possibility of imposing compulsory arbitration in the event of a dispute in the public transport sector and in services related to fuel, and the need to determine whether strikes for the purpose of inter-union solidarity are still prohibited (section 4(d), (e) and (g) of Decree No. 71-86, as amended by Legislative Decree No. 35-96 of 27 March 1996); labour, civil and penal sanctions applicable to strikes involving public officials or workers in specific enterprises (sections 390(2) and 430 of the Penal Code and Decree No. 71-86);
- the Civil Service Bill; in its previous observation, the Committee noted a Civil Service Bill which, according to UNSITRAGUA and the National Federation of State Workers' Unions (FENASTEG), requires a percentage that is too high to establish unions and restricts the right to strike. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Bill was withdrawn and that in July 2008 an inter-sectoral consultation committee was established to prepare a Bill that is consistent with the needs of the sectors involved; and
- the situation of many workers in the public sector who do not benefit from trade union rights. These workers, who are under contract under item 029 and others of the budget, should have been recruited for specific or temporary tasks, but are engaged in ordinary and permanent functions and often do not benefit from trade union rights or other employment benefits, other than wages, and are not covered by social security or by collective bargaining, where it exists. The Committee notes that the members of the Supreme Court of Justice indicated to the high-level mission that, in accordance with case law, these workers enjoy the right to organize. Nevertheless, this principle in case law has not been given effect in national practice, according to technical assistance reports, and the comments of the MSICG.

With regard to these matters, the Committee notes that, at the proposal of the 2008 high-level mission, the Tripartite Commission approved an agreement to modernize the legislation and give better effect to Conventions Nos 87 and 98. This agreement provides for "an examination of the dysfunctions of the current system of industrial relations" (excessive delays and breach of due process, failure to enforce the law and sentences, etc.), and particularly of the machinery for the protection of the right to collective bargaining and the rights of workers' and employers' organizations and their members, as laid down in Conventions Nos 87 and 98, in the light of technical considerations and the comments of a substantive and procedural nature of the ILO Committee of Experts. The Committee observes that the high-level mission undertook to provide appropriate technical assistance in relation to these matters and notes that this assistance has already started.

The Committee observed that the road map set deadlines for the submission of bills pertaining to the legislative amendments requested by the Committee of Experts (the deadline was set for 28 February 2010). It reminds the Government in this connection that a series of proposals to address the legislative problems was drawn up by the national Tripartite Commission in the first quarter of 2009 with the ILO technical assistance missions.

The Committee observes that, according to the road map drawn up by the Government in December 2008:

We have appointed a Lawyers' Commission in the Ministry of Labour with a view to analysing the feasibility of the recommendations for legislative reforms proposed by the CEACR. The opinion of that Commission was already notified to the previous ILO technical assistance mission.

We have in our possession a list of legislative initiatives proposing the adoption of amendments to Decree No. 1441 of the Congress of the Republic, the Labour Code, which are currently being examined by the Congress of the Republic. This shows the political will of the State of Guatemala gradually to resolve the problems arising from the application of Guatemalan labour law.

In addition to the above, an analysis has also been undertaken of the manner in which the right to strike of workers is penalized by the Labour Code and, taking into account the CEACR's recommendations, a study has already been prepared for submission to the state bodies for a decision.

We have also planned the strategy that we will apply to achieve the objectives set.

The Committee observes that nothing in the Government's report allows it to note progress in legislative matters. The MSICG likewise indicates that there has been no progress.

The Committee notes that, in the Committee on the Application of Standards, the Government merely referred to certain measures relating to the Civil Service Bill. The Committee notes with regret that there has been no significant progress with the legal reforms requested. The Committee is of the view that greater efforts are called for, and hopes to note progress in the near future. It expresses the firm hope that, with technical assistance from the ILO, the Government will be in a position to provide information in its next report on positive developments in the various issues raised.

Other matters

The maquila sector. For years, the Committee has been noting comments submitted by trade union organizations on serious problems in applying the Convention that relate to trade union rights in the export processing sector.

The Committee noted the comments of 2009 by the ITUC asserting that it is impossible to exercise the right to organize in export processing zones owing to the determined opposition of the employers. Only three unions have been established in the 200 export processing zones that exist and the labour authorities are incapable of exercising control over breaches of the law or failure to apply it in this sector. According to the MSICG, the fact that it is impossible to establish organizations in export processing zones is a result of anti-union practices.

The Committee noted that, in its conclusions, the high-level mission of 2008 indicated that "according to the Ministry of Labour and Social Insurance, there are seven collective accords in the export processing sector, but only two of them date from 2007. The remainder date from 2003 or even before. With regard to trade union membership, according to the administrative authorities there are six unions and a membership of 562 in the export processing sector, which employs around 200,000 workers. In the view of the executive committee of the trade union movement, there are only two unions in this sector. Whatever the correct figure, there is clearly only a minimum level of trade union activity and collective bargaining in export processing zones and hence a problem in applying Conventions Nos 87 and 98". In its report, the Government states that there are seven active trade unions in maquila and textile enterprises and one approved collective accord for the period 2008–10.

According to the Government, in 2008 the General Inspectorate of Labour dealt with 33 complaints relating to freedom of association and protection of the right to organize. Some cases were settled by conciliation, others are still pending. In 2009, the General Inspectorate of Labour dealt with 30 complaints relating to freedom of association, most of which are still being processed. In 2010, the General Inspectorate of Labour has dealt with seven complaints on freedom of association, all of which are still being processed. Lastly, the Government appends a document, dated 15 January 2010, addressed to the Public Prosecutor and the Attorney-General.

The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the exercise of trade union rights in practice in export processing zones (number of trade unions, size of their membership, number of collective agreements and their coverage, complaints of violations of trade union rights and decisions taken by the authorities, and the number of inspections). The Committee expresses the hope that the Government will continue benefiting from technical assistance from the Office so that the Convention is given full effect in the export processing sector, and requests the Government to provide information on this matter. It requests the Government to refer problems relating to the exercise of trade union rights in the maquila sector to the national Tripartite Commission, and to supply information in this regard.

National Tripartite Commission. The Committee notes that in this Commission there are problems with the recognition by all concerned of the workers' representatives, due to a division in UNSITRAGUA. The Committee notes that the Government has requested ILO technical assistance in this matter. The Committee hopes that the Government will receive the requested technical assistance.

[The Government is asked to supply full particulars to the Conference at its 100th Session and to reply in detail to the present comments in 2011.]

Guinea

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1959)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee recalls that in its previous comments the Committee raised a number of points about the national legislation as follows:

- the need for measures to set up an independent body that has the trust of the parties and is able to rule promptly on difficulties encountered in defining the minimum service where the parties are unable to agree as to the minimum service in transport and communications (which are not deemed essential in the strict sense of the term); and
- the need for measures to ensure that compulsory arbitration (established in sections 342, 350 and 351 of the Labour Code) is restricted to cases where the two parties agree to request it, in essential services in the strict sense of the term, or in the event of acute national crisis.

The Committee trusts that the Government will take the measures requested very shortly, in consultation with the representative organizations of employers and workers concerned, and asks it to provide information on any developments in the situation.

The Committee reminds the Government that it may seek technical assistance from the Office.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 26 August 2009. The Committee recalls that the 2008 ITUC comments reported assaults, by the security forces, on demonstrators and strikers, as a result of which around 40 people died and nearly 300 others were injured, arrests of trade unionists and the destruction of the headquarters of the National Confederation of Workers of Guinea (CNTG). The Committee recalls that a climate of violence in which murders and disappearances of trade union leaders go unpunished, constitutes a serious obstacle to the exercise of trade union rights and that such acts require severe measures to be taken by the authorities. When disorders have occurred involving loss of human life or serious injury, the setting up of an independent judicial inquiry is a particularly appropriate method of fully ascertaining the facts, determining responsibilities, punishing those responsible and preventing the repetition of such acts (see 1994 General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 29). The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on all the comments made by the ITUC.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Finally, the Committee notes the comments made by the ITUC, dated 24 August 2010, on the application of the Convention, in particular, the allegations concerning the search of the home of the General Secretary of the CNTG by military forces. The Committee recalls that any search of unionists' homes without a court order constitutes an extremely serious infringement of freedom of association. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in this respect.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1959)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1 of the Convention. Need to include in the national legislation specific provisions: (a) to protect all workers, and not only trade union delegates as provided in the Labour Code, against acts of anti-union discrimination at the time of recruitment and during employment; (b) to provide expressly for appeal procedures and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference; (c) to provide for rapid appeal procedures and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions for violations of section 3 of the draft new Labour Code, which provides that no employer may take into consideration membership of a trade union and trade union activities of workers in making decisions about recruitment, performance and distribution of work, termination of the employment contract, etc.

Article 2. Need to include in the draft Labour Code specific provisions on protection against acts of interference in the internal affairs of workers' and employers' organizations, accompanied by efficient and expeditious procedures and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions.

The Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary steps to ensure that the provisions of the new Labour Code, which have been under preparation for many years, are fully consistent with Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to indicate all progress towards this end in its next report.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Finally, the Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and requests the Government to provide its reply.

Guinea-Bissau

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1977)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee recalls that for several years it has been referring to the following matters.

Articles 4 and 6 of the Convention. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that it intended to pursue the process of revision of the General Labour Act, Title XI of which contains provisions on collective bargaining, and to take steps so that this text would guarantee agricultural workers and dockworkers the rights envisaged in the Convention. The Committee notes that it previously noted the Government's indication that the draft Labour Code provided for the adaptation of the application of its provisions to the specific characteristics of the work performed by agricultural workers and dockworkers. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any developments relating to this draft legislation and hopes that this draft will guarantee agricultural workers and dockworkers the rights provided for by the Convention.

The Committee previously asked the Government to send information on the measures taken to adopt the special legislation which, under section 2(2) of Act No. 08/41 on freedom of association, was to regulate the right to collective bargaining of public servants who are not engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee once again requests the Government to keep it informed of any developments in this regard.

Finally, the Committee previously asked the Government to keep it informed of any developments with regard to the promotion of collective bargaining in the public and private sectors (training and information activities, seminars with the social partners, etc.), and to send statistics on the collective agreements concluded (by sector) and the number of workers they cover. The Committee notes that the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) show that the situation with regard to collective bargaining is unsatisfactory. It reminds the Government once again that Article 4 of the Convention provides that “measures appropriate to national conditions shall be taken, where necessary, to encourage and promote the full development and utilisation of machinery for voluntary negotiation between employers or employers’ organisations and workers’ organisations, with a view to the regulation of terms and conditions of employment by means of collective agreements”. The Committee requests the Government to take concrete measures to promote greater use in practice of collective bargaining in the private and public sectors, and to indicate any developments concerning this situation, including the number of new agreements signed and the number of workers covered by such agreements. The Committee hopes that a detailed report will be provided for examination next year in the context of the regular report examination cycle and that it will contain full information on the points raised as well as on the comments made by the ITUC.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Finally, the Committee notes the comments made by the ITUC dated 24 August 2010 on the application of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

Guyana

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

- The Committee recalls that its previous observation referred to the following questions:
- the need to amend the Public Utility Undertakings and Public Health Services Arbitration Act (Chapter 54:01) in respect to: (1) conferring on the Minister broad powers to refer a dispute in the services listed in the schedule to a tribunal for compulsory arbitration and the sanction (fine or imprisonment) imposed on workers who take part in an illegal strike (section 19); (2) the schedule listing the essential services (which may be revised at the discretion of the Minister) that contains some services that go beyond those the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population (dockage, wharfage, discharging, loading or unloading of vessels, the services provided by the Transport and Harbours Department and the National Drainage and Irrigation Board cannot be considered essential services in the strict sense of the term). The Committee recalled that the authorities may establish, with the participation of workers’ and employers’ organizations, a system of minimum service in those services considered to be of public utility; and
  - section 19 of the Public Utility Undertakings and Public Health Services Arbitration (Amendment) Bill 2006 that sets higher fines than those provided for in the previous Act and maintains the imprisonment for those workers who take part in an illegal strike.

The Committee had noted the Government’s statement to the effect that there is no restriction on the right to strike and that workers who choose to strike are protected by the law. The Committee once again reminds the Government that, by conferring on the Minister broad powers to refer to compulsory arbitration disputes in services, not all of which are essential, and by providing for sanctions (fine or imprisonment) in the event of an illegal strike, the Public Utility Undertakings and Public Health Services Arbitration Act and the Bill introduced to amend it compromise the workers’ right to strike which the Committee considers to be one of the essential means available to them to protect their interests.

The Committee expresses the hope that necessary measures will be taken to amend the legislation so as to bring it in conformity with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any progress made in this respect.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

In its previous observation, the Committee referred to the recognition of only those unions claiming 40 per cent support of the workers, as set out in the Trade Union Recognition Act. The Committee takes note of the Government’s statement that, at the request of the Trades Union Congress, the Trade Union Recognition Act provided for the recognition of unions that were recognized prior to the Act without having to prove that they had majority support (section 32). All unions benefited from this provision which the Government says is no longer applicable as all certificates applicable under this section have been issued. Given that the representativeness of unions might change, the Committee recalls once again that, if no union covers more than 40 per cent of the workers in the bargaining unit, collective bargaining rights should be granted to all the unions in the unit, at least on behalf of their members (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 241). The Committee hopes that significant progress respecting this issue will be made in the near future and requests the Government to provide information on the results of the consultative process.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Hungary

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1957)

Article 2 of the Convention. Acts of interference. In previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated so as to adopt specific legislative provisions prohibiting acts of anti-union discrimination and interference. The Committee notes that the Government once again indicates in its report that it considers that the legislation in force, namely the Labour Code and Act No. CXXV of 2003 on equal treatment and the promotion of equal opportunities, set out sufficiently detailed provisions on the prohibition of all acts of interference. In this respect, the Committee notes that section 32 of the Labour Code affords a protection for certain acts of interference, stipulating that only a trade union or an employers' organization that is independent from the other is entitled to conclude a collective agreement. The Committee recalls that legislation should make express provision for rapid appeal procedures, coupled with effective and dissuasive sanctions against acts of interference in order to ensure the application in practice of Article 2 of the Convention. Moreover, to ensure that these measures receive the necessary publicity and are effective in practice, the relevant legislation should explicitly lay down these substantive provisions, as well as appeals and sanctions in order to guarantee their application (see the 1994 General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 232). In order to give effect to Article 2 of the Convention, the Committee recalls the need to adopt specific legislative provisions prohibiting acts of interference (in particular, those designed to promote the establishment of workers' organizations under the domination of employers or employers' organizations, or to place workers' organizations under the control of employers or employers' organizations through financial or other means), and establishing rapid appeal procedures, coupled with effective and dissuasive sanctions against such acts.

The Committee further notes the Government's indication that no particular legislative amendment is planned concerning protection against interference, although an expert examination was initiated in 2009 as to opportunities in finding alternative solutions for the settlement of disputes, which may, depending on the outcome of the tripartite consultations, result in a legislative act that could notably afford a better protection against acts of interference. In these circumstances, the Committee, recalling its abovementioned comments, also requests the Government to keep it informed of any development concerning the abovementioned expert examination and to provide a copy of any legislation adopted in this respect.

Article 4. Representativeness for the conclusion of collective agreements. The Committee had previously requested information on the system of bargaining agent certification at the sectoral and national levels. The Committee notes that the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), in its comments submitted on 24 August 2009, and the Workers side of the National ILO Council (including the National Federation of Autonomous Trade Unions, the Trade Union Group of Intellectuals, the Democratic League of Independent Trade Unions, the National Confederation of Hungarian Trade Unions, the National Federation of Workers' Councils and the Co-operation Forum of Trade Unions) in its comments sent along with the Government's report on 24 November 2009, both indicate that trade unions need to represent 65 per cent of the workforce (for a single union), a threshold which can hardly be achieved under a plural trade union structure, in order to be able to engage in collective bargaining (section 33(5) of the Labour Code), amend or renegotiate the collective agreement (section 37(1) and (2) of the Labour Code). The Committee further notes the Government's indication that: (i) the provisions cited above require a relatively high rate of employees for the conclusion of the collective bargaining agreement, as several representative trade unions are unable to enter into one jointly in a given case; (ii) in such a case, the lack of consensus among the trade unions necessitates the observation of the rules according to which the trade union with the highest rate support will be entitled to enter into the collective bargaining agreement, reaching about two-thirds (65 per cent) share mentioned above; and (iii) as amendments have been made recently to the Act on the legal status of public servants (subsection 4 of section 12/A of Act No. XXXIII of 1992 on the legal status of public servants), according to which a trade union having at least a 50 per cent support may conclude the collective bargaining agreement in a similar case, the Government would be ready to discuss an amendment to section 33(5) of the Labour Code. The Committee recalls that high percentage requirements for the recognition of a collective bargaining agent may impair the promotion and development of free and voluntary collective bargaining. In addition, the Committee recalls that where, under a system for nominating an exclusive bargaining agent, there is no union representing the required percentage to be so designated, collective bargaining rights should be granted to all unions in this unit, at least on behalf of their own members (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 241). The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate in its next report any measures taken or contemplated so as to lower the 65 per cent requirement in section 33(5) of the Labour Code, as well as any measure taken or envisaged in order to ensure that where no union represents 65 per cent of the employees in a bargaining unit, collective bargaining rights are granted to all unions in the unit, at least on behalf of their own members.

Finally, the Committee had also requested information on developments concerning a draft Bill pertaining to certain aspects of social dialogue. The Committee notes that, according to the Government's report, Act No. LXXIII of 2009, on the National Council for the Reconciliation of Interests ("NCRI Act"), and Act No. LXXIV of 2009, on the Sectoral Dialogue Committees and certain issues of the medium-level social dialogue ("SDC Act"), entered into force on 20 August 2009. The Committee will provide its observations on these two Acts in its next report, once translated by the Office.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations. The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend its legislation so as to ensure the right to organize of judges (article 23(2) of the Constitution and section 11(4) of the Law on Social Associations). The Committee had noted the Government's explanation that judges have a special legal status within the State system and the particular nature of their function justifies the constitutional limitation of their rights. The Committee recalls that the only exceptions authorized by Convention No. 87 are members of the police and the armed forces and therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that judges can establish organization for defence and furtherance of their interests. It requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to specify the categories of workers covered by the term "law enforcement bodies" whose right to organize is restricted under the same provisions. The Committee had noted from the Government's report, as well as from the definition provided for in section 256(2) of the Labour Code (2007), that firefighting and prison services are included in the definition of the "law enforcement bodies" and therefore, its personnel is excluded from the right to organize. The Committee considers that while exclusion from the right to organize of the armed forces and the police, as stated above, is not contrary to the provisions of Convention No. 87, the same cannot be said for fire service personnel and prison staff. The Committee is of the opinion that the functions exercised by these two categories of public servants should not justify their exclusion from the right to organize on the basis of Article 9 of the Convention (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 56). The Committee therefore requests the Government to ensure that fire service personnel and prison staff enjoy the right to organize. It requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

Right to establish organizations without previous authorization. The Committee had noted that in its report, the Government makes reference to section 10(1) of the Law on Social Associations, applicable to employers' organizations and providing for a minimum requirement of ten people to form an association. The Committee recalls that a requirement of a membership of at least ten employers to create an employers' organization is too high and likely to be an obstacle to the free creation of employers' organizations. It therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to amend its legislation so as to lower this requirement. It requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to provide its observations on the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), referring to violations of Article 2 of the Convention in practice, in particular high registration cost, which makes registration of trade unions almost impossible. In view of the fact that no information has been provided by the Government in this respect, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide its observations on the comments of the ITUC.

Article 3. Right of organizations to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. The Committee had noted Chapter 32 of the Labour Code (2007) regulating collective labour disputes. The Committee understands that the process of settlement of collective labour disputes begins with the procedure provided for by section 289, which requires that claims of workers should be formulated at the meeting (conference) of employees gathering not less than half of the total workforce and adopted by the majority of those present. The Committee considers that trade unions should be free to regulate the procedure of submitting claims to the employer and that the legislation should not impede the functioning of a trade union by obliging a trade union to call a general meeting every time there is a claim to be made to an employer. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to amend section 289 of the Labour Code so as to ensure the right of trade unions to submit claims to the employers without their prior approval by a general meeting of workers. It requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee had noted that the right to strike is prohibited in the civil service (section 10(6) of the Law on Civil Service). Furthermore, according to section 231(2) of the Labour Code, public service employees cannot participate in any action impeding normal functioning of the service and their official duties. The Committee therefore understands that the right to strike of public servants is restricted or even prohibited. The Committee considers that the prohibition of the right to strike should be limited to public (or civil, as the case may be) servants exercising authority in the name of the State. The Committee notes that pursuant to section 230 of the Code, the list of services considered public was adopted by the Government on 27 September 2007 and concerns categories of workers who cannot be considered as exercising authority in the name of the State. With regard to the "civil service", while noting from the Government's report that teachers, doctors and bank employees are not civil servants, the Committee requests the Government to provide a full list of the services falling into this category. Therefore, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures, including through amendment of the relevant legislative provisions, in order to ensure that the prohibition of the right to strike is limited only to public (or civil, as the case may be) servants exercising authority in the name of the State. It requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee had noted that pursuant to section 303(1) of the Labour Code, strikes are illegal in organizations carrying out dangerous industrial activities (subsection (1)) and in other cases provided for by the national legislation (subsection (5)). The Committee requests the Government to clarify which organizations fall into the category of organizations carrying out dangerous industrial activities and the categories of workers whose right to strike is so restricted. The Committee further requests the Government to indicate all other categories of workers whose right to strike is restricted by other legislative texts and to provide copies thereof.

The Committee further noted that according to section 303(2), in the rail and public transports, civil aviation and communications, a strike may be held if the necessary range of services, as determined on the basis of a prior agreement with the local executive authorities, is maintained. The Committee recalls that in situations in which a total prohibition of strikes would not appear to be justified (as in services mentioned above) and where, without calling into question the right to strike of the large majority of workers, one might consider ensuring that users' basic needs are met or that facilities operate safely or without interruption, the minimum service as a possible alternative to a total prohibition would be appropriate. However, in the view of the Committee, such a service should meet at least two requirements. Firstly, and this aspect is paramount, it must genuinely and exclusively be a minimum service, that is one which is limited to the operations which are strictly necessary to meet the basic needs of the population or the minimum requirements of the service, while maintaining the effectiveness of the pressure brought to bear. Secondly, since this system restricts one of the essential means of pressure available to workers to defend their economic and social interests, their organizations should be able, if they so wish, to participate in defining such a service, along with employers and the public authorities. It would be highly desirable for negotiations on the definition and organization of the minimum service not to be held during a labour dispute, so that all parties can examine the matter with the necessary objectivity and detachment. The parties might also envisage the establishment of a joint or independent body responsible for examining rapidly and without formalities the difficulties raised by the definition and application of such a minimum service and empowered to issue enforceable decisions (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 161 and 162). The Committee therefore requests the Government to amend section 303(2) of the Labour Code so as to ensure the application of these principles. It requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee had noted that according to section 298(2) of the Labour Code, the decision to call a strike is taken by a meeting (conference) of workers (their representatives) gathering not less than half the total workforce and the decision is adopted if not less than two-thirds of those present at the meeting (conference) have voted for it. The Committee considers that while a requirement of a strike ballot does not, in principle, raise problems of compatibility with the Convention, the ballot method, the quorum and the majority required should not be such that the exercise of the right to strike becomes very difficult, or even impossible in practice; if a member State deems it appropriate to establish in its legislation provisions which require a vote by workers before a strike can be held, it should ensure that account is taken only of the votes cast and that the required quorum and majority are fixed at reasonable level (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 170). In these circumstances, the Committee considers that while the quorum provided for by section 298(2) seems to be compatible with the freedom of association principles, the requirement that a decision to strike should be taken by two-thirds of those present at the meeting is excessive and limits the right to strike. The Committee therefore requests the Government to amend section 298(2) of the Labour Code so as to lower this requirement and so as to ensure that account is taken only of the votes cast in determining the outcome of a strike ballot. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee had noted that section 299(2)(2) of the Labour Code imposes the obligation to indicate, in the strike notice, its possible duration. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether workers or their organizations can declare a strike for an indefinite period of time.

Article 5. Right of organizations to establish federations and confederations and to affiliate with international organizations. For several years, the Committee had been requesting the Government to amend section 106 of the Civil Code and article 5(4) of the Constitution so as to lift the ban on financial assistance to national trade unions by an international organization. The Committee had noted that the Government reiterates that other than monetary, the financial assistance also includes such forms of support as property, equipment, motorized transport, communications and printing equipment. The Committee considers that legislation prohibiting the acceptance by a national trade union of financial assistance from an international organization of workers to which it is affiliated infringes the principles concerning the right to affiliate with international organizations of workers and that all national organizations of workers and employers should have the right to receive financial assistance from international organizations of workers and employers respectively, whether they are affiliated or not to the latter. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take steps to amend section 106 of the Civil Code, as well as article 5 of the Constitution, so as to lift this prohibition and to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it had requested the Government to institute an independent investigation into the comments concerning interference by the employer in trade unions' internal affairs and activities and refusals to bargain collectively submitted by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) (now the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC)). The Committee regrets that no information has been provided by the Government in this respect. The Committee reiterates its request and trusts that the Government will be more cooperative in the future.

Articles 1, 2 and 4 of the Convention. The Committee had previously requested the Government to specify the categories of worker covered by the term "law enforcement bodies" whose right to organize is restricted under article 23(2) of the Constitution and section 11(4) of the Law on Social Associations. The Committee had noted from the Government's report, as well as from the definition provided for in section 256(2) of the Labour Code (2007), that firefighting and prison services are included in the definition of the "law enforcement bodies" and therefore excluded from the right to organize and to bargain collectively. The Committee considers that while the armed forces and the police can be excluded from the application of the Convention, the same cannot be said for fire service personnel and prison staff. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that these categories of worker enjoy the rights afforded by the Convention.

Article 2. The Committee had previously noted that sections 4(4) and 18(2) of the Law on Trade Unions prohibited acts of interference in the affairs of workers' organizations and requested the Government to provide details on the procedures available to trade unions in cases of infringement, as well as the specific sanctions provided by the legislation. The Committee had noted sections 150 and 150-1 of the Criminal Code concerning interference in the activities of social organizations and interference in the legitimate activities of workers' representatives, respectively, and providing for a penalty equivalent to up to five times the monthly wage or imprisonment to be imposed on an "official" found guilty of committing the offence using his or her position. The Committee requests the Government to clarify whether this provision applies in both the public and the private sectors.

Article 4. The Committee had noted that according to section 282(2) of the Labour Code, workers who are not members of any trade union may either authorize an existing trade union or choose another representative for the purposes of collective bargaining. If several workers' representatives exist at the enterprise, they can establish a joint representative body to negotiate a collective agreement. The Committee considers that when a representative trade union exists and functions at the enterprise, allowing other workers' representatives to bargain collectively could not only undermine the position of the trade union concerned, but also infringe upon the rights guaranteed under Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to amend its legislation so as to ensure that where there exist in the same undertaking both a trade union representative and an elected representative, the existence of the latter is not used to undermine the position of the union in the collective bargaining process. It requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee had noted that the obligation imposed on the employer to conclude a collective agreement was repealed (once the Law on Collective Agreements was repealed) and that section 281 of the Labour Code enshrines the principle of free and voluntary negotiations. The Committee notes, however, that under section 91 of the Code on Administrative Breaches (2001), an unfounded refusal to conclude a collective agreement is punished by a fine. The Committee recalls that the legislation, which imposes an obligation to achieve a result, particularly when sanctions are used in order to ensure that an agreement is concluded, is contrary to the principle of free and voluntary negotiations. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide information on the application of section 91 of the Code in practice.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Kenya

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1964)

The Committee notes with satisfaction that the Constitution was formally adopted on 27 August 2010 and that it specifically recognizes to everyone the right to form, join or participate in the activities and programmes of trade unions or employers organizations, and for trade unions, employers and employers' organization to engage in collective bargaining (section 41).

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that under section 10 of the Labour Relations Act (LRA) 2007, claims of infringement of employees' rights, including claims of anti-union discrimination, must first be referred in writing to the minister to appoint a conciliator and, should conciliation fail to resolve the claim within 30 days (or a longer period, should both parties agree) from the appointment of the conciliator, section 73(1) provides that the claim may then be referred to the Industrial Court. The Committee had requested the Government to indicate the average time period for the adjudication of anti-union discrimination cases by the Industrial Court. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the Industrial Court is an independent arm of Government that sets its own activities and programmes and that adjudication of disputes may depend on various dynamics including response of the parties, the number of cases filed and the complexity of the files. The Committee recalls that the existence of general legal provisions prohibiting acts of anti-union discrimination is not enough if they are not accompanied by effective and rapid procedures to ensure their application in practice (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 214). The Committee recalls the importance to ensure a short average time period for the adjudication of anti-union discrimination cases by the courts or through administrative proceedings and requests the Government to indicate the average time period of the proceedings in these cases.

Protection against acts of interference. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that the LRA makes no specific provision for protection against acts of interference, either directly or indirectly. The Committee recalls that Article 2 of the Convention provides that workers' and employers' organizations shall enjoy adequate protection against act of interference by each other or each other's agents or members in their establishment, functioning or administration. In particular, acts which are designed to promote the establishment of workers' organizations under the domination of employers or employers' organizations, or to support workers' organizations by financial or other means, with the object of placing such organizations under the control of employers or employers' organizations, shall be deemed to constitute acts of interference within the meaning of this Article. The Committee notes that according to the Government, Part 11 "Miscellaneous provisions" of the LRA confers protection against interference. Nonetheless, noting that the LRA does not contain either express provisions against acts of interference nor provisions for rapid appeal procedures, coupled with effective and dissuasive sanctions against acts of interference, the Committee requests the Government to take legislative measures to ensure the application in practice of Article 2 of the Convention.

Article 4. Trade union recognition for purpose of collective bargaining. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that section 54(1) of the LRA requires an employer to recognize a trade union if the said trade union represents "a simple majority of unionizable employees". Similarly, section 54(2) provides that employers' federations shall recognize a trade union for the purposes of collective bargaining "if the trade union represents a simple majority of unionizable employees employed by the group of employers or the employers who are members of the employers' organization within a sector". The Committee had recalled, in this respect, that problems may arise when the law stipulates that a trade union must receive the support of 50 per cent of the members of a bargaining unit to be recognized as a bargaining agent: a representative union which fails to secure this absolute majority is thus denied the possibility of bargaining (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 241). The Committee had therefore requested the Government to ensure that section 54(1) and (2) of the LRA are applied in such a manner that, where no union covers more than 50 per cent of the workers, collective bargaining may still be possible for the unions failing to acquire this percentage. In this regard, the Committee notes with satisfaction that section 41(5) of the Constitution provides that “every trade union, employers’ organization and employer has the right to engage in collective bargaining”.

Article 6. Collective bargaining in the public sector. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that section 61(1) of the LRA provides that the minister may, after consultations with the National Labour Board, make regulations establishing machinery for determining terms and conditions of employment for any category of employee in the public sector. The Committee had also noted that under section 61(3) of the LRA, the Minister may determine different terms and conditions for different categories of public employees. The Committee had recalled that all public servants, with the sole possible exception of those directly engaged in the administration of the State, should enjoy the right of collective bargaining. In these circumstances, the Committee had requested the Government to: (1) take legislative measures to ensure that employees of the Prison Department and the National Youth Service enjoy the right of collective bargaining; (2) indicate the categories of public employee, if any, for whom the minister has determined terms and conditions of employment under section 61(3) of the LRA; and (3) provide full information on the practical application of section 61(1), which provides for the establishment of collective bargaining machinery in the public sector.

The Committee notes with satisfaction that, as stated by the Government, the Constitution now explicitly recognizes the right to collective bargaining to everyone and therefore employees of the Prison Department and the National Youth Service may organize and collectively bargain accordingly. The Committee further notes that according to the Government, section 248(2)(h) of the Constitution provides for the establishment of the Salaries and Remuneration Commission in order to facilitate the harmonization of the terms and conditions of the employees in the public sector. However, no information was provided by the Government with regards to the application of section 61(3) of the LRA (which provides that the Minister may determine different terms and conditions for different categories of public employees). Considering the foregoing, the Committee requests the Government to : (1) indicate the categories of public employee, if any, for whom the minister has determined terms and conditions of employment under section 61(3) of the LRA; and (2) provide full information on the practical application of section 61(1) of the LRA, which provides for the establishment of collective bargaining machinery in the public sector and to inform of the appointment of the Salaries and Remuneration Commission as well as details about its composition and functioning, and to provide a copy of its Rules of procedures once adopted.

ITUC comments. The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 24 August 2010, indicating that interference in trade union activities and intimidation by employers are frequent, and that trade unionists often have difficulties obtaining meeting with their employers. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

Kiribati

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee noted with interest that the Kiribati Tripartite Committee drafted, with the assistance of the ILO, several amendments to national labour laws in order to give effect to the Committee’s previous comments. The Committee noted, in particular that, upon adoption of the Trade Unions and Employers’ Organizations Amendment Bill, section 21 of the Trade Union and Employers’ Organizations Act, will be amended by introducing a comprehensive guarantee of the right to organize for all workers and employers. Moreover, upon adoption of the Industrial Relations Code Amendment Bill, section 39 of the Industrial Relations Code will be amended so that a strike decision can be adopted upon approval by a majority of employees who voted in the ballot. These amendments have been recently approved in the first reading by Parliament. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of progress made in the adoption of these amendments to section 21 of the Trade Union and Employers’ Organizations Act and section 39 of the Industrial Relations Code.

The Committee also noted, however, that certain issues have not been addressed yet or are still under consideration.

Article 2 of the Convention. Minimum membership requirement. The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend section 7 of the Trade Unions and Employers’ Organizations Act so as to lower the minimum membership requirement for the registration of an employers’ organization which is set at seven members. The Committee noted, from the Government’s report, that due note has been taken of this comment, which is currently under review by the Ministry of Labour, the Kiribati Chamber of Commerce and Industry and the Kiribati Trade Union Congress; the Government will inform the Committee on the outcome and measures taken as a result of these discussions. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of the outcome of consultations and to indicate in its next report any measures taken or contemplated with a view to amending section 7 of the Trade Unions and Employers’ Organizations Act so as to lower the minimum membership requirement for the registration of an employers’ organization.

Right of public employees to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. The Committee had previously noted that section L.1 of the National Conditions of Service provides that all employees are free to join a “recognized” staff association or union and had requested the Government to amend this section, given that there is no provision in the law relating to the recognition of trade unions. The Committee noted the Government's indication that due note has been taken of this comment which is currently under review with the social partners and the Committee will be kept informed of the outcome and measures taken as a result of these discussions. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of the outcome of consultations and to indicate in its next report any measures taken or contemplated with a view to amending section L.1 of the National Conditions of Service so as to remove the reference to "recognized" staff associations or unions.

Article 3. Right of employers' and workers' organizations to draw up their constitutions and rules, elect their representatives in full freedom, organize their administration and activities and formulate their programmes. Right to elect representatives freely. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that there is no provision in the law regarding the right of workers and employers to elect their representatives. The Committee noted the Government's indication that the current practice in which workers and employers elect their representatives, on the basis of their freely drawn constitution, is in line with the Convention. The Government added that it has taken due note of the Committee's comment which is currently under review by the social partners and the Committee will be kept informed of the outcome and measures taken as a result of these discussions. The Committee took due note of this information.

Compulsory arbitration. In a previous direct request, the Committee had requested the Government to amend sections 8(1)(d), 12, 27 and 28 of the Industrial Relations Code so as to limit the possibility of prohibiting strikes and imposing compulsory arbitration only to those cases which would be in conformity with the Convention. The Committee noted from the Government's report that section 12 will be amended upon adoption of the draft Industrial Relations Amendment Bill through addition of a new section 12(A)(1) according to which the registrar may only refer a trade dispute to an arbitration tribunal if: (a) all the parties to the dispute request such referral; (b) the dispute is in the public services involving public servants exercising authority in the name of the State; (c) industrial action has been protracted or is tending to endanger or has endangered the personal health, safety or welfare of the community or part of it; (d) conciliation has failed and the parties are unlikely to resolve the dispute.

In this regard, the Committee once again recalls that compulsory arbitration is acceptable under the Convention only at the request of both parties to the dispute, in essential services in the strict sense of the term, and for public servants exercising authority in the name of the State. The existence of protracted disputes (subsection(c)) and the failure of conciliation (subsection (d)) are not per se elements which justify the introduction of compulsory arbitration. Furthermore, the word "welfare" introduced in relation to essential services (subsection (c)) may include issues which go beyond the health and safety of the population in a strict sense and, in that case, would be contrary to the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to amend the Draft Industrial Relations Amendment Bill so as to remove subsection (d) from draft section 12(A)(1)(d), as well as the reference to protracted industrial action and the "welfare of the community" from draft section 12(A)(1)(c) with a view to ensuring that compulsory arbitration is possible only where this is in conformity with the Convention.

Furthermore, concerning the conciliation and mediation machinery, the Committee considers that it should have the sole purpose of facilitating bargaining: it should not be so complex or slow that a lawful strike becomes impossible in practice or loses its effectiveness (see General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, 1994, paragraph 171). The Committee observes in this regard that there are no specific time limits in the Industrial Relations Code for the exhaustion of conciliation proceedings and that sections 8(1)(a), (b), (c) and 9(1)(a) give the Registrar and the Minister the power to prolong the negotiation, conciliation and settlement procedure at their discretion, without any fixed time limits, while according to section 27(1), a strike which takes place before the exhaustion of procedures prescribed for the settlement of trade disputes, shall be unlawful. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated to ensure that specific time limits are introduced in the Industrial Relations Code so that the mediation and conciliation procedure is not so complex or slow that a lawful strike becomes impossible in practice.

Sanctions for strike action/essential services. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to lift the provision in section 37 of the Industrial Relations Code which has the effect of prohibiting industrial action and imposing heavy penalties including imprisonment in cases where a strike might "expose valuable property to the risk of destruction". The Committee notes with interest that the draft Industrial Relations Amendment Bill will amend section 37 of the Industrial Relations Code so as to lift this provision. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of progress made in the adoption of the Draft Industrial Relations Amendment Bill with a view to removing the provision of section 37 of the Industrial Relations Code which imposes heavy penalties including imprisonment for strikes in case they "expose valuable property to the risk of destruction".

The Committee also recalls that in its previous comments, it had requested the Government to amend section 37 of the Industrial Relations Code which imposes penalties of imprisonment and heavy fines for strikes in essential services. The Committee noted from the Government's report that the draft Industrial Relations Amendment Bill will amend section 37 of the Industrial Relations Code so as to increase the relevant fines from $100 to $1,000 for strikes in essential services and from $500 to $2,000 for inciting others to participate in a strike in essential services; at the same time, the prison sentences of one year and 18 months, respectively, for strikes in essential services and incitement to participate, therein, have apparently not been amended.

The Committee further recalls that it had previously requested the Government to amend section 30 of the Industrial Relations Code, which imposes sanctions of imprisonment and heavy fines against unlawful strikes in general. The Committee notes from the Government's report that the prison sentences have been lifted in the draft Industrial Relations Amendment Bill but that the applicable fines have been increased to $1,000 from $100 in case of participation in an unlawful strike and have remained at $2,000 in case of incitement to participate in an unlawful strike.

In this respect, the Committee recalls that no penal sanction should be imposed against a worker for having carried out a peaceful strike and therefore, measures of imprisonment should not be imposed on any account. Such sanctions could be envisaged only where during a strike, violence against persons or property or other serious infringements of rights have been committed, and can be imposed pursuant to legislation punishing such acts. Nevertheless, even in the absence of violence, if the strike modalities had the effect of making the strike illegitimate, proportionate disciplinary sanctions may be imposed against strikers. The Committee requests the Government to review the draft Industrial Relations Amendment Bill so as to amend sections 30 and 37 of the Industrial Relations Code in the manner indicated above.

Articles 5 and 6. Right to establish and join federations and confederations and to affiliate with international organizations of workers and employers. In its previous comments, the Committee requested information on the provisions which guarantee the right of workers' and employers' organizations to join federations and confederations of their own choice and to affiliate with international organizations of workers and employers. The Committee noted from the Government's report that the draft Trade Unions and Employers' Organizations Amendment Bill will amend section 21(2) of the Trade Unions and Employers' Organizations Act, 1998, so as to provide that workers' and employers' organizations shall have the right to join a federation of trade unions or a federation of employers' organizations and to affiliate with and participate in the affairs of any international workers' organization and to contribute to or receive financial assistance from those organizations. The Committee considers that the term "international workers' and employers' organizations" would be more appropriate than "international workers' organizations" given that the right to affiliate with international organizations should be guaranteed not only to workers' but also to employers' organizations. It, therefore, requests the Government to amend the draft Trade Unions and Employers' Organizations Amendment Bill and to keep it informed of progress made in the adoption of the Bill with a view to introducing provisions guaranteeing the right of employers' and workers' organizations to establish federations and to affiliate with international organizations of their own choosing.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee noted with interest from the Government's report that the Kiribati tripartite committee drafted, with the assistance of the ILO, several amendments to national labour laws in order to give effect to the Committee's previous comments. The Committee also noted, however, that certain issues had not yet been addressed in the draft or are still under consideration.

Application of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 3 of the Industrial Relations Code excludes prison officers from the application of the provision concerning collective labour disputes and reminded the Government that prison officers should enjoy the rights and guarantees enshrined in the Convention. The Committee noted from the Government's report that due note had been taken of this comment which is currently under review by the Ministry of Labour, the Kiribati Chamber of Commerce and Industry and the Kiribati Trade Union Congress. The Government will inform the Committee on the outcome and measures taken as a result of these discussions. The Committee hopes that the discussions will lead to the amendment of section 3 of the Industrial Relations Code so that prison officers are not excluded from the rights and guarantees enshrined in the Convention.

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that protection against acts of anti-union discrimination existed only at the time of hiring, and requested the Government to take measures to amend the legislation so as to ensure comprehensive protection against such acts during the employment relationship and at the time of dismissal. The Committee had also requested the Government to take measures so that the legislation includes express provisions for appeals and establishes sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against acts of anti-union discrimination for membership or participation in the activities of a trade union.

The Committee noted from the text of the draft Act to Amend the Trade Unions and Employer Organisations Act, 1998, that section 21 of the Trade Unions and Employer Organisations Act is to be amended by adding a subsection (3) according to which "nothing contained in any law shall prohibit any worker from being or becoming a member of any trade union, or cause a worker to be dismissed or otherwise prejudiced by reason of that worker's membership or participation in the activities of a trade union". Furthermore, according to subsection (4) no employer shall make it a condition of employment of any worker to neither be nor become a member of a trade union and any such condition in any contract of employment shall be void. The Committee also noted that according to subsection (5), "[a]ny employer who contravenes subsection (4) ... shall be liable to a fine not exceeding US$1,000 and to a term of imprisonment not exceeding six months". The Committee noted that, whereas sufficiently dissuasive sanctions were provided for in relation to subsection (4), no sanctions were established in relation to a violation of subsection (3). The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken in order to modify the provisions of the draft Act to Amend the Trade Unions and Employer Organisations Act, 1998, so that sufficiently dissuasive sanctions are imposed where a worker is dismissed or otherwise prejudiced because of his or her trade union membership or participation in the activities of a trade union.

Articles 2 and 3. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, in the national legislation, no specific legal provisions dealt with the issue of mutual interference between employers' and workers' organizations and that there were no rapid procedures and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against acts of interference by employers against workers and workers' organizations. The Committee noted from the Government's report that due note had been taken of this comment which is currently under review by the Ministry of Labour, the Kiribati Chamber of Commerce and Industry and the Kiribati Trade Union Congress. The Government will inform the Committee on the outcome and measures taken as a result of these discussions. The Committee hopes that the review currently under way will lead to measures to modify the draft Act to Amend the Trade Unions and Employer Organisations Act, 1998, so as to introduce provisions which ensure adequate protection against acts of interference in the establishment and functioning of trade unions as well as rapid procedures and dissuasive sanctions in this respect, in accordance with Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention.

Article 4. The Committee noted with interest, that upon adoption of the Trade Unions and Employer Organisations Amendment Bill, section 41 of the Industrial Relations Code would be amended by introducing a comprehensive guarantee of the right to engage in collective bargaining over wages, terms and conditions of employment, the relations between the parties and other matters of mutual interest; this guarantee will apply to every trade union or group of trade unions and also cover public servants under the national conditions of service. Moreover, the amendment provides that regulations may be made generally for the effective exercise of the right to collective bargaining, recognition of most representative organizations and the regulation of collective agreements. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the progress made in the adoption of the draft amendment to section 41 of the Industrial Relations Code. It further requests the Government to specify the provisions which guarantee this right to federations and confederations and to indicate in the future any regulations adopted to promote the effective exercise of the right to collective bargaining.

Furthermore, the Committee's previous comments concerned sections 7, 8, 9, 10, 12, 14 and 19 of the Industrial Relations Code, which allow referral of any trade dispute to compulsory arbitration at the request of one party or by decision of the authorities. The Committee is addressing this issue under Convention No. 87.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 24 August 2010 as well as the Government's reply thereon.

The Committee notes that the Labour Law governing the private sector was promulgated in February 2010 (Law 6/2010) and that the fifth Book of the Law regulates workers' and employers' organizations as well as trade union rights. The Committee notes in particular that section 98 of the Law provides for the right of workers and employers to establish organizations in both the public and private sectors. The Committee notes with satisfaction that the new Labour Law resolves a number of discrepancies between the legislation and the Convention and in particular, that it eliminates the following provisions of the former Law: the requirement of at least 100 workers to establish a trade union (section 71) and ten employers to form an association (section 86); the prohibition on joining a trade union for individuals under 18 years of age (section 72); the requirement for a certificate from the Minister of the Interior approving the founding members of a trade union (section 74); the prohibition on establishing more than one trade union per establishment, enterprise or activity (section 71); the reversion of trade union assets to the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour in the event of dissolution (section 77); and the restriction imposed on trade unions to join federations only where the activities are identical, or where industries are producing the same goods or supplying similar services (section 79).

The Committee also takes note of the report of the ILO's technical assistance mission to Kuwait held on 6-11 February 2010.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations. Domestic workers. In its previous observation, the Committee had requested the Government to amend the draft Labour Law, which excluded domestic workers from the Law's provisions, or otherwise indicate the manner in which the right of domestic workers to establish and join organizations of their own choosing is ensured. It also requested the Government to provide a copy of the model contract it had promulgated for domestic workers and their employers by virtue of Order No. 568 of 2005. The Committee notes that the Government indicated the difficulty in extending the Labour Law's provisions to domestic workers since, as domestic workers are considered members of the family, it is hard for the labour inspection department to enter private households to verify the application of the Law. The Committee notes that section 5(2) of the new Labour Law provides that the situation of domestic workers will be governed by a decision to be taken by the competent minister, which will set up the rules governing the relationship between domestic workers and their employers. The Government adds, in its report, that the labour contract further regulates the process of receiving and employing domestic workers. The Committee also notes that the report of the ILO's technical assistance mission indicates in this regard that examples were provided during the mission of how certain countries monitor the national legislation, taking into account the difficulty of labour inspectors to enter private households. The Committee recalls that Article 2 of the Convention applies to all workers without distinction, including domestic workers, who should therefore be covered by the guarantees it affords and should have the right to establish and join occupational organizations (see 1994 General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 59). The Committee hopes that the order regulating labour relations of domestic workers will be adopted in the near future and that it will guarantee the rights of domestic workers in accordance with the abovementioned principle. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any development in this respect in its next report.

Other categories of workers. In its previous observation, the Committee had asked the Government to clarify the types of workers governed by other laws referred to in the exclusions set forth in the draft Labour Law. The Government stated in this regard that the workers covered by other laws were government employees, seafarers and employees in the oil sector. The Committee notes that the new Labour Law applies to the private sector, including employees of the oil sector and maritime workers, except where specific provisions – of the Maritime Act or of the Oil Sector Labour Law – apply to them (sections 2–5 of the Law). It also notes that section 98 of the Law provides that the right of workers and employers to form organizations applies to both the public and private sectors. The Committee requests the Government, to indicate in its next report: (i) the manner in which the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing is ensured to civil servants, and to provide a copy of the relevant legislation; and (ii) whether the Maritime Act and the law governing the oil sector include provisions on trade union rights.

As regards migrant workers, the Committee had noted that the draft new Labour Law appeared to have eliminated the restrictions on trade union membership for non-national workers, including restrictions on the right to vote and to be elected to trade union office (former section 72). The Committee notes that section 99 limits to Kuwaiti workers the right to establish a trade union organization. The Committee also notes that the Government indicates in its report that the new Labour Law has repealed the minimum requirement of five years for a migrant worker to join a trade union, and adds that the admission of non-Kuwaiti workers as trade union members needs to be prescribed by specific rules and conditions; that this has been left to an Order to be issued by the competent minister, in view of the large number of new migrant workers, the speed at which they move about and their lack of stability; and that the admission of new migrant workers as members of trade unions will be based on the verification that they are stable in their living conditions in the country. Welcoming the change made by the new Labour Law as to the right of migrant workers to join trade unions and recalling that all workers, including migrant workers, shall have the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, without distinction whatsoever, in accordance with the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure full conformity of the legislation with the Convention and to provide, in its next report a copy of the Order to be issued by the minister on the admission of non-Kuwaiti workers as trade union members.

Article 3. Financial administration of organizations. The Committee had previously requested the Government to revise section 100 of the draft Labour Law so as to ensure the right of workers' and employers' organizations to organize their administration, including their finances, without interference by the public authorities. The Committee had noted with interest the Government's indication that this provision had been annulled. While noting that the Government indicates in its report that government supervision is not limited to advice and follow-up as regards the manner in which trade unions keep their administrative and financial records, as well as guidance in order to correct any defects in the data and entries contained therein (section 104 of the Labour Law), the Committee notes that under section 104(2) of the new Labour Law, trade unions are explicitly prohibited from using their funds in financial speculation, real estate or other forms of speculation. The Committee recalls that legislative provisions that give authorities the right to restrict the freedom of trade unions to invest, administer and utilize their funds as they wish for normal and lawful trade union purposes are incompatible with the principles of freedom of association and that the control exercised by public authorities over trade union finances should not go beyond the requirement for the organizations to submit periodic reports. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 104(2) of the Labour Law in accordance with the abovementioned principle.

Overall prohibition on trade union political activities. In its previous observation, the Committee had requested the Government to consider revising the draft Labour Law so as to eliminate the total ban on the political activities of workers' and employers' organizations. The Committee notes that section 104(1) of the new Labour Law maintains the prohibition for trade unions to be involved in any political matters. The Committee notes that the Government adds in its report that the prohibition of engaging in political activities is maintained since the main objective of founding a trade union is to defend workers' interests and not to engage in matters which are not to be included in the Labour Law. In these circumstances, the Committee once again recalls that legislation which prohibits all political activities for trade unions gives rise to serious difficulties with regard to the application of the Convention. Some degree of flexibility in legislation is therefore desirable, so that a reasonable balance can be achieved between the legitimate interest of organizations in expressing their point of view on matters of economic and social policy affecting their members and workers in general, on the one hand, and the separation of political activities in the strict sense of the term and trade union activities, on the other (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 133). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to revise section 104(1) of the Labour Code, so as to eliminate the total ban on political activities in keeping with the abovementioned principle, and to indicate any progress made in this regard in its next report.

Compulsory arbitration. The Committee notes that under section 131 of the new Labour Law, the ministry may intervene in a collective dispute without being asked to do so by any of the disputing parties to settle the dispute amicably and may also refer the dispute to the Reconciliation Committee or the Arbitration Board, as it deems appropriate. The Committee further notes that section 132 prohibits the parties to the dispute to stop the work, totally or partially while direct negotiations are ongoing or if the ministry has referred the dispute to the Reconciliation Committee or the Arbitration Board. The Committee understands accordingly that the intervention by the Ministry in a labour dispute may lead to an arbitration procedure being mandatory and to work stoppages being prohibited, i.e. strikes. The Committee recalls that in as far as compulsory arbitration prevents strike action, it is contrary to the right of trade unions to freely organize their activities. Compulsory arbitration to end a collective labour dispute and a strike is acceptable if it is at the request of both parties involved in a dispute, or if the strike in question may be restricted, even banned, i.e. in the case of disputes in the public service involving public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or in essential services in the strict sense of the term, namely those services whose interruption would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend sections 131–132 of the Labour Law, so as to ensure their full conformity with the abovementioned principles, and to provide information on any developments in this respect in its next report.

Article 5. Right of workers' and employers' organizations to establish federations and confederations. Restriction to a single federation. In its previous observation, the Committee requested the Government to amend the draft Labour Code, which limited trade unions to the establishment of a single general federation. In view of section 106 of the new Labour Law, the Committee understands that this provision has not been removed. The Committee further notes that the Government indicates in its report that if trade union pluralism is required and applied at the grass-roots, occupational and sectoral levels, trade union unity needs to be applied at the level of the federation and that it is neither in the national interest, nor in the workers' interest to give up this important achievement. The Committee recalls that although the Convention clearly does not aim to make trade union pluralism compulsory, pluralism must be possible in every case, even if trade union unity was once adopted by the trade union movement (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 96 and 107). The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the appropriate measures to amend section 106 of the Labour Law, so as to ensure the right of workers to establish the organization of their own choosing at all levels, including the possibility of forming more than one confederation, and to provide information on any developments in this respect in its next report.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 2007)

The Committee notes with satisfaction that the new Private Sector Labour Law No. 6 of 2010 was promulgated in February 2010, as indicated in the Government's report, and that the fifth Book of the Law regulates workers' and employers' organizations as well as trade union rights. The Committee notes, in particular, that section 98 of the Law provides for the right of workers and employers to establish organizations in both the public and private sectors, and that sections 111–132 of the Law regulate collective labour agreements and collective labour disputes. It also notes that section 46 of the Law prohibits the dismissal of a worker for legitimate trade union activities.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Latvia

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1992)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 24 August 2010, which primarily concern the matters already raised by the Committee and also refer to the reluctance of multinational companies to conclude collective agreements in their subsidiaries, as well as to the misuse of the Law on Remuneration of Officials and Employees of State and Local Government Authorities by undertakings to avoid the implementation of collective agreements. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

Articles 4 and 6 of the Convention. Right of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State to bargain collectively. The Committee takes due note of the information provided by the Government on a number of legislative changes and other measures aimed at promoting collective bargaining. The Committee notes that the Law of 1 December 2009 on Amendments of Labour Law provides that the Labour Law is not applicable to those employees of State and government institutions, for which remuneration and the other issues related thereto, are regulated by the Law on Remuneration of Officials and Employees of State and Local Government Authorities.

The Committee notes that, according to ITUC, the Latvian Free Trade Union Federation (LBAS) and the Latvian Employers' Confederation (LDDK), the Law on Remuneration of Officials and Employees of State and Local Government Authorities imposes excessive restrictions on the right to collective bargaining. The Committee also notes that the Government's indication that, pursuant to the social partners' request to expand the scope of collective bargaining, the Government is currently working, in cooperation with the social partners, on the proposals to amend the Law.

The Committee recalls that while Article 6 of the Convention allows public servants engaged in the administration of the State to be excluded from its scope, other categories should enjoy the guarantees of the Convention and therefore be able to negotiate collectively their conditions of employment, including wages. The Committee also recalls that a distinction should be drawn between, on the one hand, public servants who by their functions are directly engaged in the administration of the State (for example, civil servants employed in government ministries and other comparable bodies, as well as ancillary staff), who may be excluded from the scope of the Convention and, on the other, all other persons employed by the Government, by public enterprises or by autonomous public institutions, who should benefit from the guarantees provided for in the Convention (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraphs 200 and 262). The Committee recalls in this connection that the only exceptions that may be allowed to the guarantees laid down in the Convention concern the armed forces, the police and public servants engaged in the administration of the State (Articles 5 and 6). The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the results of negotiation with the social partners mentioned above, in particular as regards the introduction of legislative measures to ensure better application of the right to collective bargaining of the public servants not engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee hopes that the ongoing tripartite work will serve to find solutions in full conformity with Article 6 of the Convention.

Lesotho

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1966)

Article 3 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee referred to section 198F of the Labour Code which expressly grants specific advantages (access to premises to meet representatives of the employer, to recruit members, to hold a meeting of members and to perform any trade union functions in terms of a collective agreement) only to an authorized officer or official of a trade union that represents more than 35 per cent of the employees, as well as to section 198G(1) of the Labour Code that specifies that only the members of a registered trade union, which represented more than 35 per cent of the employees, of an employer that employed ten or more employees, were entitled to elect workplace union representatives. The Committee had recalled that the workers' freedom of choice may be jeopardized if the distinction between most representative and minority unions results, in law or in practice, in granting privileges such as to influence unduly the choice of organization by workers (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 98). The Committee had requested the Government to indicate the manner in which sections 198F and 198G(1) influence the workers' choice of their trade union organization, as well as their right to elect their representatives. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that these issues will once again be brought to the attention of the National Advisory Committee on Labour which is currently closely examining the revised Labour Code. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to indicate, in its next report, the progress made with respect to the abovementioned issue.

Labour Code (essential services). In its previous observation, the Committee requested the Government to transmit a copy of the legislation setting out the essential services. In this respect, the Committee notes that the Government has transmitted the Schedule of the Labour Code (Essential Services) Regulations 1997 which provides that the following services should be regarded as essential for the purposes of the Labour Code: health services, hospital services, electricity services, water supply services, sanitary services, telecommunications services, air traffic control services, fire prevention and extinguishing services, transport services necessary to the operation of any of the services abovementioned. Furthermore, the Committee takes due note that the Government indicates that the law provides for alternative compensatory machinery in the form of arbitration meant for speedy resolution of disputes in the essential services.

Public Services Act. Restrictions on the exercise of activities. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to amend section 19 of the Public Services Act (2005) so as to ensure that the prohibition of the right to strike in the public service is limited to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the Ministry of Public Service has been engaged in some discussions regarding the comments made by the Committee, and while no amendments have been put in place yet, the Ministry of Public Service is of the opinion that there is need for more discussion and training within the public service for employees and employers to understand the content and consequences of the right to strike. The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate, in its next report, the progress made with respect to the abovementioned issue and it hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Compensatory guarantees. With respect to the public servants who may be deprived of the right to strike under the Public Services Act, taking into account the comments mentioned in the preceding paragraph, the Committee had also requested the Government to establish compensatory guarantees, such as arbitration machinery for those workers who may be deprived of the right to strike. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that in terms of compensatory guarantees section 18 of the Public Services Act provides for arbitration to resolve disputes, while the arbitration is only binding in cases where the dispute arises from an essential service. The Government has indicated that in other disputes parties have to agree to their dispute being referred to arbitration. Section 17 of the Public Services Act provides for conciliation of disputes of interest but the decision shall not be binding on the parties; however, under the Code of Good Practice 2008, an unresolved dispute of interest shall be referred to arbitration or tribunal for final determination. The Government realizes that these sections contain limitations and therefore the Ministry of Public Services is looking into it for possible amendments to the law. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide information on any development in this regard.

The right to form federations and confederations. Finally, the Committee had requested the Government to ensure that public officers' associations established under the Public Services Act are guaranteed the right to establish federations and confederations and affiliate with international organizations. The Committee takes note of the Government's indication that according to the Ministry of Labour, due to the nature of the service provided by the state public officers, their associations cannot affiliate with trade union federations and confederations. The Committee recalls that a provision of national law prohibiting organizations of public officials from adhering to federations or confederations is difficult to reconcile with Article 5 of the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the respect of the abovementioned principle and to provide information in its next report on the measures adopted in this regard.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1966)

Article 4 of the Convention. Representativeness requirements for certification of a union as the exclusive bargaining agent. The Committee had previously noted that section 198B(2) of the Labour Code, as amended by the 2006 Amendment Act, provides that the arbitrator may conduct a ballot "if appropriate" in the determination of disputes concerning trade union representativity. It had subsequently requested the Government to amend the Labour Code by introducing a formal requirement for ballots to be held in determination of trade union representativity, thereby removing the arbitrator's discretion as to whether a ballot is "appropriate" in the circumstances. In this respect, the Committee had noted the Government's statement that leaving the decision to conduct a ballot to the arbitrator's discretion is justified, as not all disputes concerning trade union representativity – such as those concerning whether particular employees fall inside the relevant bargaining unit or not – may be resolved by resorting to a ballot. The Government had further indicated that the decisions of the arbitrator are subject to review by the Labour Court. The Committee indicated that it trusted that under section 198B(2) of the Labour Code, as amended, disputes which require the holding of elections to determine which trade union is most representative are disposed of by means of a ballot. The Committee notes the Government's indication that its abovementioned comments will be considered by the National Advisory Committee on Labour. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the work of this Committee and hopes that the necessary measures to amend the Labour Code will be taken so as to ensure that new organizations, or organizations failing to secure a sufficiently large number of votes, may ask for a new election after a certain period has elapsed since the previous election.

Recognition of the most representative union. The Committee had previously noted that section 198A(1)(b) of the Labour Code defines a representative trade union as “a registered trade union that represents the majority of the employees in the employ of an employer”, and that section 198A(1)(c) specifies that “a majority of employees in the employ of an employer means over 50 per cent of those employees”. It had subsequently requested the Government to take the necessary legislative measures so as to ensure that when no union covers more than 50 per cent of the workers, collective bargaining rights are granted to all the unions in the unit, at least on behalf of their own members. The Committee recalled that problems may arise when the law stipulates that a trade union must receive the support of 50 per cent of the members of a bargaining unit to be recognized as a bargaining agent; a representative union which fails to secure this absolute majority is thus denied the possibility of bargaining and that under such a system, if no union covers more than 50 per cent of the workers, collective bargaining rights should be granted to all the unions in this unit, at least on behalf of their own members (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 241). The Committee notes the Government's indication that its abovementioned comments will be considered by the National Advisory Committee on Labour. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the work of this Committee and hopes that the necessary measures to amend the Labour Code will be taken so as to ensure the respect for the abovementioned principle. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate whether, in practice, minority unions enjoy collective bargaining rights in cases where there is no union representing 50 per cent of the workers concerned. If this is the case, the Committee requests the Government to provide relevant examples and statistics.

Collective bargaining in the education sector. In its previous comments the Committee had requested the Government to take all necessary measures so as to promote a prompt and negotiated solution to the long-standing disputes concerning teachers in the public sector and guarantee to them the rights enshrined in the Convention. The Committee takes note from the Government's report that the Education Act of 2010 was promulgated. According to the Government, this Act may provide a solution to the long-standing disputes concerning teachers in the public sector. According to the Government's report, this Act stipulates that teachers are employed by the Teaching Service Commission and disputes arising out of the teaching services are referred to the Teaching Service Tribunal, whose decisions are final and binding. However, “courts of law” have the jurisdiction to hear reviews from the Tribunal. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that following the promulgation of the Labour Code (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2010, all labour disputes whether from the public or private sector can now be heard by the Court of Appeal on questions of law. Therefore, according to the Government, the teachers' dispute can now be referred to the Court of Appeal. Noting, however, that the Education Act of 2010 and the Labour Code (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2010 have not been attached, the Committee requests the Government to transmit a copy of these legislative texts with its next report.

The Committee further notes that the Government indicates in its report that it takes upon itself to call a meeting of all stakeholders wherein the long standing issue of the teachers in the public sector shall be discussed to its finality. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard and recalls that, in conformity with the Convention, teachers of the private and the public sectors should enjoy collective bargaining rights.

Liberia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in communications dated 29 August 2008 and 24 August 2010 concerning the application of the Convention and, more particularly, allegations of serious violence against strikers and the closure of a trade union radio station. Noting that in previous comments, the ITUC had already referred to threats, arrest and prosecution of strikers, the Committee recalls that all appropriate measures should be taken by the Government to guarantee that trade union rights can be exercised in safe and secure conditions and in a climate free of violence, pressure, fear and threats of any kind. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in reply to all the abovementioned allegations of the ITUC in its next report.

In its previous observation, the Committee had recalled that, for many years, it had been asking the Government to take the necessary steps to amend or repeal the following provisions, which were inconsistent with Articles 2, 3, 5 and 10 of the Convention:

- Section 4601-A of the Labour Practices Law prohibiting agricultural workers from joining industrial workers' organizations;
- Section 4102, subsections 10 and 11, of the Labour Practices Law providing for the supervision of trade union elections by the Labour Practices Review Board; and
- Section 4506 of the Labour Practices Law prohibiting workers in state enterprises and the public service from establishing trade unions.

The Committee had also noted that Decree No. 12 of 30 June 1980 prohibiting strikes had been repealed. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that a new Labour Code – titled Decent Work Bill (2009) – has been drafted but still needs to be finalized and that a copy of it will be attached to the next report. More particularly, the Committee notes that the Government indicates that: (i) Chapter 9, Part Two of the Decent Work Bill attempts to fully address the issues surrounding strikes and lockouts; and (ii) issues arising under sections 4506 and 4601-A of the Labour Practices Law are addressed in Chapter 2 (section 6(a)) of the Decent Work Bill which provides that “all employers and workers, without distinction whatsoever, may establish and join organizations of their own choosing without prior authorization, and subject only to the rules of the organization concerned”. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the Decent Work Bill will be enacted in the very near future and will repeal all the provisions of the legislation that had previously been identified as in violation of ILO Conventions, including section 4102 of the Labour Practices Law.

The Committee requests the Government to provide in its next report information on any development in this respect, as well as a copy of the Decent Work Bill once adopted and of the law which repealed Decree No. 12 of 30 June 1980 prohibiting strikes.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), in a communication dated 24 August 2010, on the application of the Convention, in particular as regards the failure to implement a collective agreement on the living and working conditions of workers in rubber plantations and other issues previously raised by the Committee. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon in its next report.

In its previous observation, the Committee, noting that a new Labour Code – entitled the Decent Work Bill – was being finalized, had expressed the hope that this reform process would take into full consideration the matters it had been commenting upon for many years, which concern the need for:

- legislation guaranteeing to workers adequate protection against anti-union discrimination at the time of recruitment and during the employment relationship, accompanied by sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions;
- legislation guaranteeing to workers' organizations adequate protection against acts of interference by employers and their organizations, including sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions; and
- legislation guaranteeing the right to collective bargaining to employees in state-owned enterprises and public servants who are not public officials engaged in the administration of the State.

In its previous observation, the Committee had noted that, according to the Government, the Decent Work Bill will fully protect the workers and their organizations against anti-union discrimination both at the time of recruitment and during the employment relationship, as well as against acts of interference by the employers and their organizations, and will also ensure the right to collective bargaining of state-owned enterprise employees. The Committee once again expresses the firm hope that the Decent Work Bill will give full effect to the Convention in line with its comments abovementioned, including that concerning the right to collective bargaining of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State, and requests the Government to provide a copy of the Decent Work Bill once adopted.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee takes note of the Government's indication of the promulgation of a new Labour Relations Act (No. 12 of 2010) which contains provisions addressing issues raised by the Committee for many years on the implementation of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of Act No. 12 of 2010 on labour relations, as well as any regulation issued under it. The Committee will proceed to the examination of any progress made in relation to questions it recalls below once the text is received.

The Committee takes note of the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on 24 August 2010 in relation to issues already under examination by the Committee, and in particular according to which the Government sets salaries unilaterally. The Committee notes the Government's reply according to which the wages of state employees are issued by virtue of an Act, which is publicly debated in the people's basic congresses, which are responsible for their approval. The Committee recalls that public servants not engaged in the administration of the State should enjoy the rights enshrined by the Convention, including the right to collective bargaining which covers wages.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to ensure that the legislation protects explicitly, and through sufficiently dissuasive sanctions, all workers (including public servants not engaged in the administration of the State, agricultural workers and seafarers) against all acts of anti-union discrimination at the time of recruitment and during the employment relationship. The Committee notes the Government's indication that section 3 of Act No. 12 of 2010 specifies that favouritism or discrimination on the grounds of trade union membership, among others, shall be prohibited, and that section 77 of the Act provides that a worker's contract may not be terminated for a reason linked to his/her trade union membership, or because of his/her participation in a trade union activity outside or during working hours, with the approval of the employer. The Committee takes note of this information and requests the Government to specify the sanctions provided in the new law against acts of anti-union discrimination.

Article 4. Collective bargaining. In its previous comments, the Committee referred to sections 63, 64, 65 and 67 of the Labour Code, which require the clauses of collective agreements to be in conformity with the national economic interest, thus violating the principle of the voluntary negotiation of collective agreements and the autonomy of the bargaining parties. The Committee also took note of the Government's indication that a new Act on labour relations would repeal the abovementioned provisions so as to give collective bargaining full scope taking into account the Committee's previous observation. The Committee notes from the report of the Government that sections 63, 64, 65 and 67 of the Labour Code Act were repealed by virtue of Act No. 12 of 2010.

The Committee also referred previously to the absence of collective agreements covering public servants not engaged in the administration of the State, agricultural workers and seafarers, and expressed the hope that any new legislation will expressly grant to these categories of workers the right to bargain collectively. The Committee notes the Government's indication that exceptions mentioned in the previous Labour Code (domestic workers and agricultural workers) was addressed by Act No. 12 of 2010, which now includes all categories of workers except workers regulated by other laws or special regulations and family workers. The Committee takes note of this information and requests the Government to confirm that seafarers are not excluded from the application of the new legislative provisions and to specify the legislative text applicable to public servants not engaged in the administration of the State with regard to their collective bargaining rights. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate whether the workers that are regulated by other laws or special regulations are granted the rights and guarantees set out in the Convention.

Furthermore, the Committee invites the Government to provide any statistics available on the number of collective agreements presently in force by sector, and the number of workers they cover.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1994)

The Committee notes the comments on the application of the Convention submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on 24 August 2010, and the comments submitted by the Lithuanian Trade Union Confederation (LPSK) on 31 August 2010 on the application of the Convention and in particular on certain restrictions of the right to strike already referred to by the Committee. Furthermore, the Committee notes the comments submitted by the LPSK on 9 September 2010 and the Lithuanian Trade Union "Sandrauga" on 13 October 2010. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the Ministry of Social Security and Labour will analyse the amendments to the Labour Code as suggested by the Committee in its last observation. In these circumstances, the Committee recalls its previous comments and trusts that they will be taken into account in the process of revision of the Labour Code.

Article 3 of the Convention. Right of organizations to freely organize their activities and to formulate their programmes

(a) Unilateral determination of minimum service. The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend section 80(2) of the Labour Code so as to ensure that, in the event of disagreement among the parties to the collective labour dispute on the minimum service, the definition of the service to be ensured may be determined by an independent and impartial body. The Committee had noted that according to the new amendment to subsection 2, the minimum services shall be determined by the parties to the collective dispute within three days from the day of submission of warning about the strike to the employer. The Committee had noted, however, that, according to subsection 3, if no agreement is reached by the parties to the dispute, the decision shall be made by the Government or a municipal executive body upon consultation with the parties to the dispute. The Committee had underlined that it would be highly desirable for negotiations on the definition and organization of the minimum service not to be held during a labour dispute, so that all parties can examine the matter with the necessary objectivity and detachment (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 161). As regards the legal requirement that any disagreement on the minimum services shall be settled by the authorities, the Committee had recalled that the legislation should provide for any such disagreement to be settled by an independent body, and not by the Government or a municipal executive body. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 80(3) of the Labour Code accordingly and to indicate any progress made in this respect.

(b) Compensatory guarantees. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to provide information on the manner in which claims of workers in essential services are settled and on the relevant body responsible for taking the final decision in this respect. The Committee had noted that, by virtue of the recent amendments, strikes are prohibited in first aid medical services and the demands put forward by the workers concerned are settled by the Government upon consultation with the parties to the collective labour dispute (section 78). The Committee had recalled in this respect that if the right to strike is subject to restrictions or a prohibition, workers who are thus deprived of an essential means of defending their socio-economic and occupational interests should be afforded compensatory guarantees, for example conciliation and mediation procedures leading, in the event of deadlock, to arbitration machinery seen to be reliable by the parties concerned. It is essential that the latter be able to participate in determining and implementing the procedure, which should furthermore provide sufficient guarantees of impartiality and rapidity (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 164). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 78(1) accordingly and to indicate any progress made in this respect.

The Committee is also raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Madagascar

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide its observation in reply to the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in August 2008 concerning restrictions on the exercise of freedom of association under a Decree of 2000 requiring trade unions to provide the list of their members, interference by the authorities in the appointment of worker representatives to tripartite bodies and violations of trade union rights in the maritime sector. The Committee notes that, according to the Government's report, solutions were found to these matters and that a draft decree on trade union organization and representativeness currently being drafted should allow all problems to be resolved. Furthermore, the Committee notes the ITUC's comments dated 24 August 2010 concerning the legislative matters already raised by the Committee, as well as restrictions on the right to strike imposed on state employees. The Committee requests the Government to provide in its next report: (i) its observations in reply to the ITUC's new comments; (ii) information on the adoption of the decree on trade union organization and representativeness and, if applicable, a copy of the text adopted; and (iii) the findings of the independent investigation that the Government indicates is under way concerning the anti-union acts in the maritime sector, and any action taken on these findings.

Legislative matters. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that Act No. 2003-044 of 28 July 2004 issuing the Labour Code did not take into account the Committee's comments on several issues of non-conformity with the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the Committee's comments will be transmitted to the National Labour Council so that it can carry out an analysis of the Labour Code and take the appropriate measures. The Committee hopes that amendments will soon be made to the Labour Code and that they will take due account of the comments that it has been making for several years. The Committee recalls that its comments concern the following points.

Article 2 of the Convention. Workers governed by the Maritime Code. The Committee previously noted that the Labour Code maintains the exclusion from its scope of workers governed by the Maritime Code, and that the Maritime Code does not contain sufficiently clear and precise provisions ensuring the right of the workers to whom it applies to establish and join trade unions, as well as the related rights. Furthermore, the Committee noted that the Maritime Code of 2000 was being revised and that a draft new Code including new provisions guaranteeing seafarers the right to establish and join trade unions, as well as all the related rights, had been presented in August 2008. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that this right is recognized in the legislation.

Article 3. Representativeness of workers' and employers' organizations. The Committee previously noted that section 137 of the Labour Code provides that the representativeness of employers' and workers' organizations participating in social dialogue at the national level "shall be established with the elements provided by the organizations concerned and the labour administration". The Committee requests the Government to avoid any interference by the public authorities in the decision concerning the representativeness of occupational organizations and to take measures to ensure that this decision is made by an independent body having the confidence of the parties according to a procedure that offers full guarantees of impartiality.

Compulsory arbitration. The Committee previously noted that, under sections 220 and 225 of the Labour Code, in the event of the failure of mediation, the collective dispute shall be submitted by the ministry responsible for labour and social legislation either to a contractual arbitration procedure, in accordance with the collective agreement between the parties, or to the arbitration procedure of the competent labour court. The arbitration award is final and without appeal and brings an end to the dispute, including any strike that has been called in the meantime. In this regard, the Committee recalls that recourse to arbitration to end a collective dispute is acceptable only if it is at the request of both parties involved in the dispute and/or in the case of a strike in essential services in the strict sense of the term. The Committee requests the Government to take all necessary measures to amend the provisions of the Labour Code concerning arbitration based on the above principle.

Requisitioning. The Committee previously noted that section 228 of the Labour Code provides that the right to strike “may be limited by requisitioning only in case of the disruption of public order or where the strike would endanger the life, safety or health of the whole or part of the population”. The Committee recalls that the reference to cases of “acute national crisis”, rather than to the notion of the disruption of public order, would better reflect the position of the ILO supervisory bodies and could moreover lead to the repeal of section 21 of Act No. 69-15 of 15 December 1969, which provides for the possibility of requisitioning workers in the event of the proclamation of a state of national necessity. The Committee requests the Government to take necessary measures to that end.

Sanctions in the event of strike action. The Committee previously noted that, under section 258 of the Labour Code, the “instigators and leaders of illegal strikes” shall be punished by a fine and/or imprisonment. The Committee recalls that no penal sanctions should be imposed on a worker for having carried out a peaceful strike and that therefore measures of imprisonment should not be imposed on any account. Such sanctions could be envisaged only where, during a strike, violence against persons or property or other serious infringements of rights have been committed, and can be imposed pursuant to legislation punishing such acts. Nevertheless, even in the absence of violence, if the strike modalities had the effect of making the strike illegitimate, proportionate disciplinary sanctions may be imposed on strikers. The Committee requests the Government to take all necessary measures to ensure that this principle is observed.

The Committee notes the Government’s report and the replies provided to the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in 2008. With regard to the comments concerning the absence of social dialogue in the mining sector and in export processing zones, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that collective bargaining is being developed in the mining sector at the initiative of mining companies and that enterprises in export processing zones participate in the discussions held within the National Labour Council alongside the most representative organizations of employers and workers. The Committee notes the new comments made by the ITUC dated 24 August 2010 that a 2009 survey of the trade union movement revealed that collective agreements were signed mainly in public enterprises and that the privatization process has resulted in most of the collective agreements concluded in sectors such as the rail, telecommunications and energy sectors being obsolete. Furthermore, according to the ITUC, most known cases of anti-union discrimination concern employers in export processing zones where trade union organizations are not well established. Other cases of discrimination are also possible in so far as trade unions are obliged to provide lists of all their members, which, according to the ITUC, paves the way for anti-union practices. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in reply to the ITUC’s new observations.

Article 4 of the Convention. Criteria of representativeness. In its previous observation, referring to section 183 of the Labour Code which establishes a number of criteria for determining the representativeness of organizations of employers and workers, the Committee noted the Government’s indication that a draft decree on trade union organization and representativeness could not be adopted by the National Labour Council due to a lack of unanimous support, but that discussions were still being held on the matter. In its latest report, the Government indicates that the draft decree was approved by the National Labour Council in December 2008 and is awaiting adoption by the Council of Ministers. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any developments relating to the adoption of the decree on trade union organization and representativeness and, if applicable, to provide a copy of the text. It hopes that the text adopted will take into account the principle that trade union representativeness should always be determined according to objective and pre-established criteria, so as to avoid any possibility of bias or abuse.

Promotion of collective bargaining. Referring to the provisions of the Labour Code concerning collective bargaining, the Committee previously requested the Government to provide information on the measures adopted to promote collective bargaining in enterprises employing fewer than 50 workers as well as on the collective agreements concluded in these enterprises. The Committee notes that, according to the Government’s report, the National Institute of Labour promotes collective bargaining through awareness raising and the training of staff representatives, trade union delegates and other workers on collective bargaining, particularly on negotiation techniques. The Institute also organizes annual workshops which are well attended by enterprises with fewer than 50 employees (25–30 on average). The Committee notes this information. It requests the Government to provide information on the number of collective agreements concluded in enterprises employing fewer than 50 workers and to indicate the number of workers and sectors covered.

Article 6. Collective bargaining for seafarers. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Labour Code excludes maritime workers from its scope and requested the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure the adoption of specific provisions on the collective bargaining rights of seafarers governed by the Maritime Code. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the Ministry of Labour participated in drawing up the draft new Maritime Code and that the fundamental rights of seafarers have been respected. However, as a result of the political and social crisis, the adoption of the draft Maritime Code by the Council of Ministers has been suspended. The Committee trusts that the draft new Maritime Code will provide that the rights guaranteed by the Convention are extended to maritime workers and hopes that the Government will be able to report its adoption in its next report.

Collective bargaining for public servants not engaged in the administration of the State. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to adopt formal provisions clearly recognizing the protection of all public servants and public sector employees not engaged in the administration of the State against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference and their right to bargain collectively on their conditions of employment. In its report, the Government indicates that the Public Service Higher Council (CSFOP) serves as a platform for negotiation and dialogue for public servants not engaged in the administration of the State. All legislative and regulatory texts concerning the public service must be referred for an opinion to the CSFOP, which is composed of an equal number of representatives of the relevant ministerial departments and the most representative trade union confederations. The Government adds that, despite the lack of a specific text, certain decrees implementing Act No. 2003-011 of 3 September 2003 on the general conditions of service of public servants, particularly those laying down the conditions governing travel and remuneration, are applicable to contractual public employees governed by Act No. 94-025 of 17 November 1994. The Committee notes this information, but considers that the situation still creates uncertainty to the legal framework applicable to the collective bargaining of public servants, which could hinder the development of collective bargaining and goes against the requirements of the Convention. It also notes that no measures have been taken to ensure protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference in the public sector. The Committee once again requests the Government to adopt formal provisions clearly recognizing the protection of all public servants and public sector employees not engaged in the administration of the State against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference and their right to bargain collectively on their conditions of employment. The Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary steps to that end and will give an account of the progress made in its next report. Furthermore, the Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of any collective agreement concluded in the public sector.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes the Government replies to the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 26 August 2009. The Committee also notes the comments submitted by ITUC dated 24 August 2010 that mainly refer to matters previously raised by the Committee.

In its previous comments, the Committee, noting that sections 45(3) and 47(2) of the Labour Relations Act empower the parties concerned to apply to the Industrial Relations Court for a determination as to whether a particular strike involves an essential service, had requested the Government to provide information on any strike declared illegal and the reasons therefor, as well as on any decisions rendered by the Industrial Relations Court under these sections of the Labour Relations Act. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that: (i) no strikes have been declared illegal on the basis of essential services; (ii) no request for determination of an essential service has been made before the Industrial Relations Court; and (iii) the social partners considered that a clear list of what should be considered an essential service under the Labour Relations Act should be established; in this regard, a provision had been included in the Labour Relations (Amendment) Bill for the establishment of a subcommittee of the Tripartite Labour Advisory Council whose purpose is to determine a list of what should be considered an essential service under the Labour Relations Act. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report of any development concerning the establishment of the subcommittee and the advancement of its work.

A request concerning other points is being addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1965)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It notes the International Trade Union Confederation's (ITUC) communication dated 24 August 2010, which refers to obstacles to the exercise of collective bargaining rights and in particular the requirement in practice of very high representation thresholds. The Committee further notes that the ITUC also refers to difficulties in the export processing zones (EPZs) and, finally, restrictions to trade union rights in certain enterprises or institutions. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

Malaysia

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report and response to the comments made by the International Trade Unions Confederation (ITUC) on 24 August 2010 that the amendments to the Trade Union Act, 1959, and the Industrial Relations Act (IRA), 1967, have been approved by Parliament and came into effect on 28 February 2008, and that the Industrial Relations Regulations 2009 were subsequently enacted on 8 October 2009. According to the Government, the amendments to the IRA provide, inter alia, for a fast and efficient procedure for recognition for collective bargaining purposes. The Committee also notes the conclusions reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2301 (353rd Report of the Committee on Freedom of Association, paragraphs 133–140, and the 356th Report, March 2010). The Committee therefore requests the Government to transmit a copy as soon as possible of the final version of the abovementioned legislation.

Articles 1 and 4 of the Convention. Trade union recognition for purposes of collective bargaining. Duration of proceedings for the recognition of a trade union. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the comments by the ITUC reiterating issues previously raised by the Committee regarding long delays in the treatment of union claims to obtain recognition for collective bargaining purposes. The Committee had requested the Government to submit more precise information on the ITUC's comments in the light of the provisions of the IRA and to indicate the average duration of proceedings for the recognition of a union, as well as the requirements for obtaining recognition. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, under the new legislations, the average duration of proceedings for the recognition of a union is nine (9) months, provided that the parties involved do not challenge the process through judicial review in the court or raise issues that could cause delays. The Committee considers that this average duration of proceedings is excessively long and requests the Government to take measures to modify the legislation in order to reduce the length of proceedings for the recognition of trade unions.

Procedure of recognition. The Committee further notes that the Government indicates that, in order to be accorded recognition, the relevant union has to undergo a competency check (conducted by the Industrial Relations Department) to ascertain whether the majority of the class of workers of the enterprise had become members of the union seeking recognition. However, the Committee notes that the Government makes no reference to the applicable legislation. The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate in its next report what the requirements in order to fulfil the competency check are and to indicate the relevant legislative provisions applicable.

In addition, the Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that, in claims for recognition, once the trade union concerned has served Form A on the company, the employer shall have 21 days to either accord the recognition or to reject the claim. Should the company reject the claim for recognition, either at the end of the 21 days or anytime before that, then the union has to inform the Director General of Industrial Relations (DGIR) within 14 days after receiving such notification by the company. The DGIR will then take appropriate action. The Committee further notes that section 9(5) of the IRA states that the Minister has the final say on whether recognition is to be accorded by the employers to the unions. However, an aggrieved party may apply for a judicial review at the High Court against the decision. While recalling again the excessive length of these proceedings, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the criteria applicable to the decisions of the DGIR and/or the Minister.

Sanctions applicable for refusal to apply orders of recognition and of reinstatement. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the Government's statement about the comments previously made by the ITUC with regard to the inefficiency of labour courts concerning the application of the provisions of the Convention. On this matter, the Committee had noted the ITUC's comments that the Government failed to apply any sanctions against employers who opposed the directives of the authorities granting trade union recognition or who have refused to comply with Industrial Court orders to reinstate unlawfully dismissed workers. The Committee had requested the Government to submit its observations on these matters.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that: (i) the Industrial Court has jurisdiction for trade disputes under section 26 of the IRA and in cases of dismissals under section 20 of the IRA; (ii) under section 56(1), (3) and (4) and section 60 of the IRA, there are procedures and sanctions applicable against employers who opposed the directives of the authorities granting trade union or who have refused to comply with Industrial Court orders to reinstate unlawfully dismissed workers; and (iii) the Industrial Relations Department has set up a Legal Division to initiate legal proceedings against any errant party that contravenes the law. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to provide details about the composition and functioning of the Legal Division of the Industrial Relations Department, and to provide a copy of its Rules of Procedures. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information and statistics on any sanctions against employers who opposed the directives of the authorities granting trade union recognition or who have refused to comply with Industrial Court orders to reinstate unlawfully dismissed workers in the last two years.

Migrant workers. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that, although foreign and local workers enjoy equal rights; migrant workers can join a union but cannot be elected as trade union officers under the Trade Union

Act. In this respect, the Committee had recalled that workers, including migrant workers, should enjoy the right to elect their representatives freely and it had requested the Government to communicate its observations on the exercise of trade union rights by migrant workers in law and in practice. The Committee notes the Government's indication that: (i) to form and to be elected as trade union representatives, the foreign workers require permission from the Minister of Human Resources; (ii) there are currently trade unions who have foreign workers as members; and (iii) foreign workers have been appointed as representatives of certain trade unions. The Committee considers that the requirement for foreign workers to obtain the permission from the Minister of Human Resources in order to be elected as trade union representatives hinders the right of trade union organizations to freely choose their representatives for collective bargaining purposes. The Committee requests the Government to take measures in order to modify the legislation.

Scope of collective bargaining. The Committee had previously urged the Government to amend the legislation so as to bring section 13(3) of the IRA, which contains restrictions on collective bargaining with regard to transfer, dismissal and reinstatement (some of the matters known as "internal management prerogatives"), into full conformity with Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee notes with regret that the Government indicates in its report that there is no need to amend the said provision and reiterates that: (i) section 13(3) of the IRA is not intended to limit collective bargaining, but rather to provide for the right of employers to run their business in the most efficient way and to protect from abuse of the collective bargaining process; and (ii) these requirements are not absolute and matters relating to them may be brought to the Industrial Relations Department and, if no settlement is reached, the matter may be referred to the Industrial Court for adjudication (section 13(8) of the IRA). The Committee further notes the case law Sarawak Commercial Banks Association v. Sarawak Bank Employees' Union, submitted by the Government. Nevertheless, the Committee considers that section 13 of the IRA restricts the scope of negotiable matters. The Committee recalls that measures taken unilaterally by the authorities to restrict the scope of negotiable issues are often incompatible with the Convention; tripartite discussions for the preparation, on a voluntary basis, of guidelines for collective bargaining are a particularly appropriate method to resolve these difficulties (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 250). The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to amend section 13(3) of the IRA so as to remove these restrictions on collective bargaining matters and to initiate tripartite discussions for the preparation, on a voluntary basis, of guidelines for collective bargaining.

Compulsory arbitration. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that section 26(2) of the IRA allows compulsory arbitration, by the Minister of Labour of his own motion even in case of failure of collective bargaining. The Committee had requested the Government to take measures to ensure that the legislation only authorizes compulsory arbitration in essential services, in the strict sense of the term, for public servants engaged in the administration of the State or in cases of acute national crisis. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates that, although the provision accords discretionary powers to the Minister to refer a trade dispute to the Industrial Court for arbitration, practically, the Minister has never exercised such power in an arbitrary manner and only makes a decision upon receipt of a notification from the Industrial Relations Department that the conciliation has failed to resolve the dispute amicably. The Committee once again recalls that the imposition of compulsory arbitration procedure if the parties do not reach agreement on a draft collective agreement raises problems in relation to the application of the Convention. Therefore, the Committee once again reiterates its previous comments and urges the Government to take measures to ensure that the legislation only authorizes compulsory arbitration in essential services, in the strict sense of the term, for public servants engaged in the administration of the State or in cases of acute national crisis.

Restrictions on collective bargaining in the public sector. The Committee has for many years requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure for public servants not engaged in the administration of the State the right to bargain collectively over wages and remuneration and other employment conditions. The Committee notes with regret that the Government, invoking the peculiarities of the public service, once again reiterates that it will maintain the policy of not engaging in that kind of collective bargaining with the employees of the public sector. The Government once again points out that trade unions can express their views on matters concerning conditions of work through the National Joint Council and the Departmental Joint Council. Nevertheless, the Committee, while recognizing the singularity of the public service which allows special modalities, considers that simple consultation with unions of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State do not meet the requirements of Article 4 of the Convention. Therefore, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure for public servants not engaged in the administration of the State the right to bargain collectively over wages and remuneration and other employment conditions, in conformity with Article 4 of the Convention.

The Committee reminds the Government that it may avail itself of the ILO's technical assistance so as to bring its law and practice into full conformity with the Convention if it so wishes.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 24 August 2010, concerning the application of the Convention and in particular the impossibility for senior managers of the Central Bank of West African States (BCEAO) to organize. The Committee notes the Government's reply indicating that the legislative texts referred to by the ITUC, namely the Labour Code, do not deny senior managers of the BCEAO the right to organize and that the labour inspectorate has received no complaints in this regard.

Article 3 of the Convention. Right of workers' organizations to formulate their programmes without interference from the public authorities. For several years, the Committee has been stressing the need to amend section L.229 of the 1992 Labour Code in order to limit the power of the Ministry of Labour to resort to arbitration to end strikes liable to cause an acute national crisis. This section allows the Minister of Labour to refer certain disputes to compulsory arbitration, not only where they involve essential services the interruption of which is likely to endanger the life, personal safety or health of the population, but also where the dispute is likely to "jeopardize the normal operation of the national economy or involves a vital industrial sector". The Committee notes that the Government's report mentions the validation in July 2010 of a study on the conformity of the labour legislation with the fundamental labour conventions and the preparation of a draft amendment text which includes the revision of section L.229 of the Labour Code. The Committee hopes that the Government will indicate in its next report that tangible progress has been made in amending section L.229 of the Labour Code to bring it into conformity with the requirements of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of any text adopted in this regard.

Furthermore, the Committee previously noted that a draft revision of Decree No. 90-562 P-RM of 22 December 1990 establishing the list of services, positions and categories of workers strictly indispensable to the maintenance of a minimum service in the event of a strike in the public services was the subject of consultations under way with the social partners. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the draft decree was adopted by the Government during the Council of Ministers on 11 June 2010. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the draft Decree revising Decree No. 90-562 P-RM of 22 December 1990.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1965)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 3 of the Convention. Right of organizations to freely organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to clarify whether, under the terms of sections 74 of the Employment and Industrial Relations Act 2002 (EIRA), compulsory arbitration before the Industrial Tribunal could still be imposed over disputes of interest. The Committee had also requested information on the number of strikes and the incidents of recourse to the Minister's power to refer disputes to the Industrial Tribunal at the request of only one party. The Committee had noted the Government's explanation to the effect that, where a trade dispute exists or is apprehended, the parties to the dispute may agree to refer the dispute to the Director of Industrial and Employment Relations or to a conciliator chosen by the parties themselves or by the Director; thus the mechanism is purely voluntary. It is only where the parties choose to resort to conciliation, and the conciliator reports a deadlock, that the Director refers the matter to the Minister for eventual referral to the Industrial Tribunal. Furthermore, the Government had indicated that in 2007, five strikes were resolved through mediation and not through recourse to the Industrial Tribunal.

While noting this information, the Committee observes, nevertheless, that under section 74(1) and (3) of the Employment and Industrial Relations Act, where conciliation fails, any of the parties to the dispute may notify the Minister who in turn may refer the dispute to the Tribunal for settlement.

Further noting the information given by the Government that the Employment and Industrial Relations Act 2002 will be under review for possible amendment, the Committee requests the Government to ensure that due consideration is given, within this exercise, to amending section 74(1) and (3) of that law so that arbitration may not be imposed unless both parties agree. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any developments in this regard.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1965)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to indicate the procedures applicable for the examination of allegations of anti-union dismissals by public officers, port workers and public transport workers given that those categories are excluded from the jurisdiction of the industrial tribunal pursuant to section 75(1) of the Employment and Industrial Relations Act 2002 (EIRA). The Committee had noted from the Government's report that public officers have the right to appeal to the Public Service Commission, an independent body (the members are appointed by the President of Malta acting on the advice of the Prime Minister given after a consultation with the Leader of the Opposition and they cannot be removed except for inability or misbehaviour causes) established under section 109 of the Constitution of Malta. The Committee also notes from the Government's report that the Public Service Commission's primary role is to ensure that disciplinary action taken against public officers is fair, prompt and effective. The Committee requests the Government to indicate, with regard to cases of anti-union dismissal, whether the Public Service Commission is empowered to grant such compensatory relief – including reinstatement and back pay awards – as to constitute sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee also once again requests the Government to indicate the procedures applicable for the examination of allegations of anti-union dismissals of port workers and public transport workers.

Articles 2 and 3. Protection against acts of interference. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated so as to introduce in the legislation an explicit prohibition of acts of interference, as well as sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against such acts given that the EIRA does not expressly protect employers' and workers' organizations from acts of interference by one another, in each other's affairs. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report, the measures taken or contemplated so as to introduce in the legislation an explicit prohibition of acts of interference, as well as sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against such acts.

Article 4. Collective bargaining. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated with a view to amending section 6 of the National Holidays and Other Public Holidays Act, so as to ensure that this provision: (i) does not render automatically null and void any provisions in existing collective agreements which grant workers the right to recover public holidays falling on a Saturday or Sunday; and (ii) does not preclude voluntary negotiations in the future over the issue of granting workers the right to recover national or public holidays which fall on a Saturday or Sunday on the basis of a collective agreement (see 342nd Report of the Committee on Freedom of Association, Case No. 2447, paragraph 752). The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated with a view to amending section 6 of the National Holidays and Other Public Holidays Act.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1961)

Comments of the ITUC. The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 24 August 2010, concerning legislative matters already raised by the Committee, as well as violations of freedom of association in 2009. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in reply to the ITUC's comments.

Legislative amendments. For several years, the Committee has been requesting the Government to take the necessary measures to amend its legislation to bring it into full conformity with the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that, in the context of the revision of the texts implementing the Labour Code, a technical committee composed of labour inspectors will take the necessary measures to amend the legislation to bring it into full conformity with the Convention and that particular attention will be paid to all sections which have been the subject of comments by the Committee. The Committee notes this information and expresses the firm hope that the Government's next report will indicate concrete progress in the revision of the Labour Code to bring it into full conformity with the Convention. The Committee further hopes that the Government will take due account of all points recalled below. In this regard, the Committee notes that the Government expresses its wish to continue benefiting from technical assistance from the Office.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers to establish and join organizations of their own choosing without prior authorization. Minors who are of the minimum legal age for admission to employment. For several years, the Committee has been requesting the Government to amend section 269 of the Labour Code to remove any obstacles that prevent minors who have access to the labour market from exercising the right to organize. The Committee recalls that, under Article 2 of the Convention, the minimum age for joining a trade union in full freedom must be the same as that established for admission to employment, without the permission of the parents or guardian being necessary. The Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary measures to amend section 269 of the Labour Code so as to guarantee the right to organize of minors who are of the minimum legal age for admission to employment (14 years according to section 153 of the Labour Code), whether as workers or as apprentices, without the permission of their parents or guardians being necessary.

Magistrates. For several years, the Committee has been commenting on the need to ensure that magistrates enjoy freedom of association. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that magistrates have preferred to form neutral associations for the defence of their interests and that they have not expressed the wish to establish unions. The Committee is bound to recall once again that magistrates are not covered by the exceptions allowed by Article 9 of the Convention and that they ought to enjoy, like all other categories of workers, the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, in accordance with Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that magistrates enjoy the right to establish and join occupational organizations of their own choosing.

Article 3. Right of workers' organizations to elect their representatives in full freedom and to organize their administration and activities without interference from the public authorities. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 278 of the Labour Code extends the procedure for the establishment of trade unions to any changes in their administration or management, and therefore has the effect of subjecting such changes to the approval, either of the Prosecutor-General or of the courts. The Committee therefore indicated that this provision gives rise to serious risks of interference by the public authorities in the organization and activities of trade unions and their federations. It recalled that the establishment or amendment of the statutes of an organization of workers is the responsibility of the organization itself and should not be subject to the prior consent of the public authorities in order to take effect. The Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary measures to amend section 278 of the Labour Code so as to provide that any change in the administration or management of a union may take effect as soon as the competent authorities have been notified and without the requirement of their approval.

Compulsory arbitration. For many years, the Committee has been noting that sections 350 and 362 of the Labour Code allow compulsory arbitration in instances which go beyond essential services in the strict sense and in situations which cannot be deemed to constitute an acute national crisis. The Committee recalls that the prohibition or restriction of the right to strike by means of compulsory arbitration can be justified only in the cases of: (1) essential services in the strict sense of the term, that is, services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population; (2) an acute national crisis and then only for a limited period and to the extent necessary to meet the requirements of the situation. The Committee trusts that the Government will amend the relevant sections of the Labour Code so as to limit the prohibition on strikes by means of compulsory arbitration only to essential services in the strict sense of the term and to situations of acute national crisis.

Duration of mediation. In its previous comments concerning the prohibition on strikes for the duration of the mediation procedure established under section 362 of the Labour Code, the Committee recalled that it was possible to require the exhaustion of conciliation and mediation procedures before a strike may be called, on condition that the procedures are not so complex or slow that a lawful strike becomes impossible in practice or loses its effectiveness. However, the Committee considered that the maximum period of 120 days for mediation provided for in section 346 of the Labour Code was too long. The Committee expects that the Government will amend section 346 of the Labour Code to reduce the maximum duration of mediation before a strike may be called.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Mauritius

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2005)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the Mauritius Employers' Federation dated 11 May 2010, by the Confederation of Private Sector Workers (CTSP) dated 7 June 2010 on the application of the Convention and by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 24 August 2010. The Committee also notes the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2685 (355th Report).

The Committee notes with satisfaction that the Government indicates in its report that the Employment Relations Act 2008 (ERA) was proclaimed and took effect from 2 February 2009, addressing the following issues previously raised by the Committee: (i) section 5(1)(f) of the ERA establishes that the minimum membership requirement for the establishment of an employers' organization is five employers; (ii) section 28 of the ERA provides that the registrar may investigate into any complaint against a trade union only if it is made by not less than 5 per cent of the members; (iii) section 45(c) of the ERA provides that the deduction of trade union fees from a workers' wage shall cease to have effect in the manner provided for in the rules of the trade union; (iv) section 83(2) of the ERA provides that a worker shall not be entitled to any remuneration while on strike unless otherwise agreed by the parties; (v) sections 85(2), 87(2) and 90(5) of the ERA concerning the composition of the Employment Relations Tribunal, the Commission for Conciliation and Mediation and the National Remuneration Board, provide that the members of these bodies shall be appointed by the minister after consultation with the most representative organizations of workers and employers; and (vi) section 97 of the ERA lists the matters which "may" (instead of "shall") be taken into account by the Tribunal, Commission or Board in the framework of their activities.

Nevertheless the Committee notes that certain discrepancies remain between certain provisions of the ERA and the Convention, especially in relation to the mechanism for the resolution of industrial disputes. The Committee examines these issues in a request directly addressed to the Government.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right to organize. In its previous observation, the Committee requested the Government to indicate the measures taken to guarantee migrant workers their trade union rights both in law and in practice and to take the necessary measures for the collection of data on the unionization levels of migrant workers in the export processing zones and offshore companies. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that: (i) section 13 of the ERA provides that every employee, citizen or not, holding a work permit, shall be entitled to be a member of a trade union and that sections 29 and 32 of the ERA provide for the rights, respectively, of workers and employers, to freedom of association; (ii) section 29 also applies to migrant workers; (iii) sensitization campaigns are being held by officers of the Special Migrant Workers Unit (set up at the Labour Division of the Ministry of Labour, Industrial Relations and Employment) to apprise migrant workers of the provisions of the ERA, inter alia, basic workers' rights to freedom of association; (iv) the workforce in large establishments of the Export Oriented Enterprises sector was of 66,138 as at March 2007 (61 per cent women and 24 per cent migrants), of 66,782 as at March 2008 (59 per cent women and 27 per cent migrants) and of 57,107 as at March 2009 (58 per cent women and 29 per cent migrants); and that (v) steps are being taken by officers of the Special Migrant Workers' Unit to collect information on the rate of unionization of migrant workers during the inspection visits that are carried out. The Committee requests the Government to provide further information in its next report on the activities undertaken by the Special Migrant Workers' Unit, the number of trade unions and the rate of unionization in EPZs, including vis-à-vis migrant workers.

Finally the Committee notes that the Government has requested ILO technical assistance in relation with the application of Conventions Nos 87 and 98 and hopes that this assistance will be provided in the near future.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1969)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the Mauritius Employers' Federation dated 11 May 2010, by the Confederation of Private Sector Workers (CTSP) dated 7 June 2010, and by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 24 August 2010, as well as the Government's reply thereon. The Committee further notes the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2685 regarding alleged anti-union dismissals and the refusal to recognize a trade union (355th Report).

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference. In its previous observation, the Committee noted the comments made by trade unions regarding the prevalence of anti-union discrimination in the textile sector, especially vis-à-vis migrant workers, as well as the obstacles faced by unions in meeting workers inside or even outside work premises. The Committee requested the Government to provide its observations thereon and recalled the importance not only of prohibiting acts of interference, but also of making provision for rapid appeals procedures coupled with sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions. The Committee notes from the Government's report that the Employment Relations Act 2008 (ERA), which replaces the Industrial Relations Act 1973 (IRA), was proclaimed and took effect from 2 February 2009. The Committee notes with satisfaction that sections 30, 31 and 33 of the ERA clearly prohibit all acts of anti-union discrimination and interference – which were not sufficiently addressed by the IRA – and that sections 103 and 104 reinforce the sanctions applicable. It also notes that the Government indicates that these provisions apply to the textile sector, to export processing zones (EPZs), as well as vis-à-vis migrant workers.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee notes with satisfaction that the ERA includes a number of provisions which promote collective bargaining through different means (including the prohibition of unfair practices and the guarantee of the right to access the necessary information) and that it applies to all sectors, including EPZs.

Collective bargaining in the public sector. Furthermore, in its previous observations, the Committee had requested the Government to transmit its observation on the right to negotiate salaries in the public sector. The Committee takes note of the information provided by the Government in its report regarding negotiations over salaries in the public sector in 2007–08. The Committee notes, in particular, that the Pay Research Bureau constitutes the permanent and independent body in charge of keeping under review the pay and grading structures in the public sector. It further notes that the Bureau adopts a consultative approach when undertaking the general pay review every five years. The Government's report adds that in 2007–08, although there were no negotiations over salaries in the public sector, extensive consultations took place in the context of the overall pay review (i.e. 1,275 consultative meetings and 2,600 written representations). The Committee also notes that the Government indicates that in its 2010–15 Programme, it announced that the National Pay Council will be phased out and that a tripartite mechanism will be instituted as a permanent forum for discussion among social partners, with a view to better understanding and responding to the challenges facing the country, and that appropriate consultations with stakeholders will be initiated to that effect. The Committee welcomes these consultations and recalls that bipartite collective bargaining is a fundamental element of the Convention. Finally, the Committee notes that, according to the CTSP, the number of collective agreements signed in 2009 has been reduced by 70 per cent. The Committee requests the Government to comment on this assertion.

The Committee requests the Government to provide in its next report statistical information on collective agreements in the country (number of agreements in the public and private sectors, subjects dealt with and number of workers covered) and to indicate any concrete measure undertaken to promote collective bargaining in the specific sector of EPZs as well as in the textile sector and vis-à-vis migrant workers. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any development regarding the institution of the abovementioned tripartite mechanism as a permanent forum.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1950)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) of 2008. The Committee also notes the ITUC's comments dated 24 August 2010 which refer to the application of the Convention, as well as the murder of two trade union leaders and the illegal imprisonment of a trade union member. The Committee recalls that the right to life is a fundamental prerequisite for the exercise of the rights concerned in Convention No. 87 and emphasizes that when disorders have occurred involving loss of human life or serious injury, the setting up of an independent judicial inquiry is a particularly appropriate method of fully ascertaining the facts, determining responsibilities, punishing those responsible, remedying the damages and preventing the repetition of such actions. Judicial inquiries of this kind should be conducted as promptly and speedily as possible, since otherwise there is a risk of de facto impunity which reinforces the climate of violence and insecurity and which is therefore highly detrimental to the exercise of trade union activities (see the General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 29). The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in this respect.

Article 2 of the Convention. Trade union monopoly in state agencies imposed by the Federal Act on State Employees and by an Act issuing regulations under the Constitution. The Committee recalls that for many years it has been commenting on the following provisions:

- (i) the prohibition of the coexistence of two or more unions in the same state agency (sections 68, 71, 72 and 73 of the Federal Act on State Employees);
- (ii) the ban on trade unionists leaving the union of which they have become members (an exclusion clause under which trade unionists who leave the union lose their jobs) (section 69 of the Federal Act on State Employees);
- (iii) the ban of unions of public servants joining trade union organizations of workers or rural workers (section 79 of the Federal Act on State Employees);
- (iv) the extension of the restrictions applying to trade unions in general to the Single Federation of Unions of State Employees (section 84 of the Federal Act on State Employees); and
- (v) the imposition by law of the trade union monopoly of the National Federation of Banking Unions (section 23 of the Act to regulate article 123(XIIIbis)(B) of the Constitution).

In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that: (i) the right of state employees to organize freely is guaranteed by article 123(X)(B) of the Constitution, which lays down the right of workers to associate in order to defend their common interests and exercise the right to strike when the rights laid down in this provision are violated generally and systematically; (ii) the implications of the ruling of the Supreme Court of Justice in the case for the protection of constitutional rights (amparo) on appeal No. 1475/98, and of rulings Nos P/J 43/1999, CXXVII/2000, 2<sup>a</sup> LVII/2005, and other similar rulings, determining the freedom of state employees to join freely the unions which accept them, and establishing that there may be more than one union in agencies, and that trade union leaders in the sector may be re-elected, have been applied strictly by the Federal Conciliation and Arbitration Tribunal (TFCA); (iii) in this respect, three federations of state employees are registered with the TFCA, namely the Federation of Unions of Workers in the Service of the State (FSTSE), the Democratic Federation of Public Servants Unions (FDSSP) and the Federation of Banking Unions (FSB); and (iv) on 1 July 2009, an initiative was launched with a draft decree to amend various provisions of the Federal Act on State Employees issued under article 123(B) of the Constitution with the objective of promoting the freedom of state workers to organize by eliminating the ban on establishing more than one union in each agency of the public authority and repealing article 123(B)(XIIbis). The Committee notes this initiative with interest and hopes that the decree will be adopted in the near future. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any developments in this respect.

Article 3. Ban on re-election in trade unions (section 75 of the Federal Act on State Employees). In its previous comment, the Committee requested the Government to amend section 75 of the Federal Act on State Employees to align it with the case law of the Supreme Court of Justice and bring it into conformity with the Convention and current ILO practice. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, even though the provision has not been amended, the Federal Conciliation and Arbitration Tribunal applies the case law referred to, with the result that in practice effect is given to the provisions of the Convention, as the case law of the Supreme Court of Justice of the Nation is binding on all jurisdictional bodies in the country. Under these conditions, taking into account the planned reform of the Federal Act on State Employees, the Committee requests the Government to examine the possibility of amending section 75 to align it with the case law of the Supreme Court of Justice with a view to bringing it into conformity with the Convention and current ILO practice.

Ban on foreign nationals being members of trade union executive bodies (section 372(II) of the Federal Labour Act). The Committee notes that the Government does not refer to this matter in its report. The Committee emphasizes that foreign workers should be allowed to take up trade union office, at least after a reasonable period of residence in the host country (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 118). The Committee requests the Government to take this principle into account in the context of a future amendment of the Federal Labour Act and to provide information on this matter in its next report.

Limited right to strike of public officials who do not exercise authority in the name of the State and requisitioning. The Committee recalls that for many years it has been making comments and requesting the Government to amend the legislation in relation to the following issues:

- (i) State employees – including workers in the banking sector – have the right to strike only if there is a general and systematic violation of their rights (section 94, Title four, of the Federal Act on State Employees, and section 5 of the Act to regulate article 123(XIIIbis)(B) of the Constitution). The Committee considers that state employees – including employees in the banking sector – who do not exercise authority in the name of the State should be able to exercise the right to strike irrespective of whether there is a general and systematic violation of rights.

- (ii) On the other hand, section 121 of the Credit Institutions Act provides that the “National Banking Commission shall ensure that during the strike as many offices as are indispensable shall remain open and as many workers as are strictly necessary to perform the functions shall continue to work”. In this respect, the Committee observed that the National Banking Commission is not tripartite. The Committee recalls that workers’ organizations should be able to take part, should they so wish, in determining the minimum service to be maintained in the event of a strike, along with employers and the public authorities (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 161).
- (iii) Section 99(II) of the Federal Act on State Employees lays down the requirement that to call a strike two-thirds of the workers in the public body concerned must be in favour. The Committee recalls in this respect that, with regard to workers who do not exercise authority in the name of the State, the ballot method, the quorum and the majority required should not be such that exercise of the right to strike becomes very difficult, or even impossible in practice (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 170).
- (iv) Several laws on the public service (the Act to regulate railways, the Act respecting national vehicle registration, the Act on general channels of communication and the Rules governing the Ministry of Communications and Transport) contain provisions for the requisitioning of staff where the national economy could be affected. The Committee recalls that the forced mobilization of workers on strike would be justified only for the purpose of ensuring the operation of essential services in the strict sense of the term (see the General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 163) and that provisions which do not relate to essential services in the strict sense of the term (such as the Act to regulate the railways, the Act on general channels of communication and the Rules governing the Ministry of Communications and Transport) should be amended.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication in relation to these matters that legislative action lies within the competence of the National Legislative Authority and that no initiatives have been submitted during the present period in relation to the amendments that are sought. In this regard, taking into account the planned reform of the Federal Act on State Employees, the Committee requests the Government to examine, together with the social partners, the possibility of making amendments as indicated above. The Committee recalls that in this process it is possible to have recourse to the technical assistance of the Office, if so desired.

Modernization of the overall labour legislation. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that: (i) with a view to modernizing labour legislation, since 2006 the Secretariat of Labour and Social Welfare (STPS) has been promoting the modernization of the legislation in this sector, since the current Federal Labour Act dates from 1970; (ii) in this regard, the STPS reviewed various initiatives to reform the Federal Labour Act that were submitted by different parliamentary groups to the Chambers of Congress of the Union and supplemented the background paper; (iii) the background paper served as a basis for the initiative to reform, supplement and repeal various provisions of the Federal Labour Act submitted to the Chamber of Deputies on 18 March 2010; (iv) the initiative proposes the modernization of 419 of the 1,010 sections of the current version of the Federal Labour Act, including the fundamental rights of workers, both individual and collective; and (v) the objectives of the initiative of labour reform are to: (a) promote the creation of high quality jobs in the formal economy; (b) develop a culture of productivity in industrial relations; (c) facilitate conducive conditions and offer legal certainty to investors; (d) promote decent work; (e) develop transparency with a view to strengthening democracy and trade union freedoms in full compliance with the autonomy of trade unions; (f) modernize and make more flexible the delivery of labour justice; and (g) integrate new mechanisms to promote compliance with labour legislation. The Government adds that the measures related to transparency and trade union democracy include the proposal to remove the so-called “exclusion on the ground of separation” clause.

Noting that the Office has made comments on the draft reform of the Federal Labour Act, the Committee expresses the firm hope that they will be fully taken into account. The Committee suggests that the Government should continue to have recourse to the technical assistance of the Office with a view to ensuring that the text that is adopted is in full compliance with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any developments in this respect in its next report.

Republic of Moldova

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1996)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 24 August 2010 which refer to the matters raised by the Committee below and by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2317.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of employers and workers to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to amend section 6 of the Law on Employers’ Organizations, which required at least ten employers to create an employers’ organization. The Committee notes with interest the Government’s indication that Law No. 121-XVIII of 23 December 2009 amended the Law on Employers' Organizations as to provide that an employers' association can be created at the initiative of three employers. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the relevant legislative text with its next report.

The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend section 10(5) of the Law on Trade Unions, according to which primary trade union organizations may acquire the status of legal entity only if they are members of a national branch or national inter-sectoral trade union, so as to guarantee the right of workers to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, including those outside of the existing national trade union structure. The Committee notes the Government's statement that the National Confederation of Trade Unions has indicated that it could support some reasonable proposals for the improvement of the rule contained in section 10(5) of the Law and that the process to amend this provision will begin in the near future. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any developments in this regard.

Article 3. Right of workers' organizations to organize their activities. The Committee had previously requested the Government to consider, in consultation with the social partners, the adoption of legislative provisions expressly providing for the participation of the relevant trade unions and employers' organizations in determining the minimum services to be ensured in the event of a strike. The Committee notes the Government's indication that this issue requires further additional examination in consultation with the social partners. The Committee expresses the hope that the necessary legislative provisions will be soon adopted and requests the Government to indicate concrete steps taken or envisaged in this regard. The Committee further once again requests the Government to transmit with its next report Decision No. 656 of 11 June 2004 providing for the list of categories of workers who are prohibited from striking pursuant to section 369 of the Labour Code.

In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to amend sections 357(1) and 358(1) of the Criminal Code providing for disproportionate penal sanctions (including imprisonment for up to three years) for organizing or conducting an illegal strike. The Committee notes the Government's indication that section 357(1) of the Code has been amended by Law No. 277-XVI of 18 December 2008 (in force since 24 May 2009) as to provide that "organizing or conducting an illegal strike, as well as preventing/hindering of an organization's, institution's or enterprise's activity, under the state of emergency, siege or war is punishable by a fine of up to the amount of 500 conventional units, or by unpaid community service for the period from 100 to 240 hours". The Committee also notes with satisfaction that section 358 of the Code was repealed by the same legislative Act.

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the Confederation of Trade Unions of the Republic of Moldova (CRSM) in a communication dated 4 September 2009 and the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 6 September 2010 concerning the issues raised by the Committee below. The Committee also notes the Government's reply to the 2008 ITUC comments.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Sanctions against acts of anti-union discrimination and of interference. In its previous observation, the Committee had noted that section 61 of the new Code on Contraventions adopted in 2008 provided for the application of fines in the amount of 40 to 50 conventional units (one unit equals 20 MDL) for the obstruction of the right of workers to establish and join trade unions. The Committee had further noted the Government's indication that the working group, constituted of representatives of the Ministry of Economy and Trade, the National Confederation of Trade Unions and the Ministry of Justice, examined the possibility of setting administrative sanctions against acts of interference in trade union activities, not covered by section 61. The Committee had requested the Government to provide information on any new developments in this respect and to ensure that these sanctions are applied through effective and expeditious procedures. The Committee notes that the ITUC and CRSM indicate that the scope of section 61 of the Code on Contraventions is very limited since it sanctions solely the obstruction of workers' right to establish and join trade unions and not all acts of anti-union discrimination and interference as prohibited by section 37(1) of the Law on Trade Unions. The Committee further notes that the Government indicates in its report that the possibility of amendment of section 61 of the Code on Contraventions will be reviewed in the near future. The Committee also notes the Government's statement in its reply to the 2008 ITUC comments that up until the adoption of the new Code on Contraventions, violations of trade union rights were covered by section 41 of the Code of Administrative Contraventions, which sanctioned violations of labour legislation and provided for the application of fines amounting to up to 250 conventional units. The Committee notes that section 55 of the new Code on Contraventions is a similar provision to section 41 of the repealed Code of Administrative Contraventions, which sanctions violations of labour legislation but provides for the application of lower fines (amounting up to 50 conventional units for individuals, 75 conventional units for responsible persons and up to 120 conventional units for legal entities). It further notes that, according to the ITUC, law enforcement remains weak. The Committee recalls the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2317 where it had requested the Government to actively consider, in full and frank consultations with social partners, legislative provisions expressly sanctioning violations of trade union rights and providing for sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against acts of interference in trade union internal affairs (see 350th Report). The Committee considers that neither section 61, nor section 55 of the Code on Contraventions provide for sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against acts of anti-union discrimination and acts of interference. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the necessary legislative amendments ensuring the adequate protection of workers' and employers' organizations against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference will soon be adopted. In this respect, the Committee requests the Government to ensure that the legislative texts adopted in the future provide for sufficiently dissuasive sanctions in cases of violation and for effective and expeditious procedures to guarantee their application in practice.

Article 4. Compulsory arbitration. In its previous observations, the Committee had requested the Government to amend section 360(1) of the Labour Code, which allowed the imposition of arbitration by the authorities at the request of one party so as to ensure that recourse to compulsory arbitration is possible only in the context of essential services in the strict sense of the term (i.e. services, the interruption of which would endanger the life, safety or health of the whole or part of the population) or for public servants engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the question of amendment of section 360(1) of the Labour Code will be examined after discussions with the social partners on the issue concerning determination of minimum services in the case of strike. The Committee also notes the Government's intention to amend section 359(2) of the Labour Code, pursuant to which in order to settle a collective dispute the parties may, within three calendar days from the beginning of the dispute, establish a conciliation commission formed of an equal number of representatives of the parties to the dispute, so as to repeal the time frame within which a conciliation commission should be established. The Committee expresses the hope that the necessary amendments to section 360(1) of the Labour Code will be adopted in the near future so as to ensure that the referral to compulsory arbitration is possible only upon request by both parties to the dispute, or for essential services in the strict sense of the term or for public servants engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee requests the Government to indicate measures taken or envisaged in this regard.

The Committee reminds the Government that it may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office if it so wishes.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1996)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 24 August 2010 on the application of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations thereon and on the ITUC's comments of 2008 concerning serious acts of violence against striking workers in the sugar cane plantation sector.

In its previous comments, the Committee noted that a new Labour Act had been adopted (Act No. 23/2007) some provisions of which are inconsistent with the Convention, namely:

- section 150, which allows the central body of the labour administration 45 days within which to register an employers' or workers' organization. The Committee pointed out that such a protracted registration procedure is a serious obstacle to the establishment of an organization, amounting to a denial of the right of workers and employers to set up organizations of their own choosing, and that this time requirement should be shortened to a reasonable length not to exceed 30 days. The Committee notes in this connection that, according to the Government, the time requirement was prescribed taking account of the country's social and economic development and the fact that Mozambique lacks a modern and computerized communication system, which slows down the transmission of information from one region to another;
- section 189, which allows compulsory arbitration for the essential services listed in section 205, which include the postal service, the loading and unloading of animals and perishable foodstuffs, weather monitoring and fuel supply, and also for export processing zones (section 206 and Decree No. 75/99). The Committee points out that compulsory arbitration to end collective labour disputes or strikes is acceptable only when requested by both parties to the dispute or where a strike may be restricted or prohibited, namely in the case of a dispute in the public service involving public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or in essential services in the strict sense of the term, that is, services the interruption of which would endanger the life or personal safety or public health of the whole or part of the population. In these circumstances, the Committee takes the view that any disputes arising in the above-mentioned services should not be subject to compulsory arbitration and that they could be settled under the mediation and conciliation procedures provided for by law;
- section 207, which provides that the notice of strike must state the duration of the strike. The Committee expressed the view that workers and their organizations should be able, if they so wish, to call an indefinite strike. In this connection it notes the information from the Government to the effect that since nothing in the law imposes a time limit on strikes, this provision may be construed as allowing a strike to be unlimited in time or indefinite;
- section 212, which allows a strike to be ended by a decision of the mediation and arbitration body. The Committee notes in this connection the Government's specification that section 212, subsection 1, provides for other procedures for ending strikes, including agreement between by the parties concerned or a decision of the trade union organization. The Committee is of the view that such a decision should be taken only by the workers and organizations that declared the strike and not by a mediation body; and

- section 268(3), which provides that any violation of sections 199 (freedom to work of non-strikers), 202(1) and 209(1) (minimum services), constitutes a breach of discipline for which the workers on strike are liable under both civil and penal law. The Committee points out that workers engaging in peaceful strike action should not be liable to penal sanctions and hence to any prison sentence. Such sanctions may be envisaged as regards strikes only in the event of violence against persons or property or other serious breaches of the law, and only in accordance with the provisions punishing such offences. However, even in the absence of violence, if a strike is unlawful due to breach of procedure, proportionate disciplinary sanctions may be applied against the strikers.

The Committee reminds the Government that in its previous comments it noted that the legislation was undergoing revision by a “legal reform technical unit” set up for the purpose and that some provisions of the Labour Code that are inconsistent with the Convention would be amended in due course with assistance from the ILO. The Committee accordingly requests the Government to provide detailed information in its next report on the progress made in revising the legislation, and hopes that the draft provisions will take account of the Committee’s comments on sections 189, 212 and 268(3) of the Labour Code.

Public servants. In its previous comments the Committee noted that public servants do not have the right to organize. It notes in this connection the adoption of Act No. 14/2009 of 17 March 2009 issuing the General Regulations for Civil Servants and Government Officials (EGFAE). Its notes that sections 76 and 77 provide that the establishment, merger, federation and dissolution of public servants’ unions and occupational associations and the right of public servants to strike shall be regulated by law. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report if such a law has been adopted and, if so, to provide a copy.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1955)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 24 August 2010, referring to grave matters already noted by the Committee.

The Committee notes the conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards of June 2010. The Committee notes, in particular, that the Conference Committee noted with great concern the continued failure by the Government, over several years, to eliminate serious discrepancies in the application of the Convention.

Civil liberties. In its previous observation, the Committee recalled the ITUC’s reference to the arrest, heavy-handed interrogation and 20 years’ imprisonment sentence for sedition imposed on six workers as well as the additional prison sentences imposed on Thurein Aung, Wai Lin, Kyaw Win and Myo Min (five years sentence for association with the Federation of Trade Unions of Burma (FTUB) and three years sentence for illegally crossing a border). It further noted the arrest of Burma Railway Union leader U Tin Hla and of Su Su Nway, who was sentenced to 12-and-a-half years in prison. Moreover, the ITUC indicated that, at the end of 2008, three workers – Khin Maung Cho (aka Pho Toke), Nyo Win and Kan Myint – employed at the A21 Soap Factory in Hlaing Thayar Industrial Zone, were sentenced to long jail terms for involvement with exiled groups, sedition and other charges.

Furthermore, in its previous observation, the Committee recalled that the ITUC had previously referred to numerous other grave violations of the Convention, including:

- the imprisonment of Myo Aung Thant, member of the All Burma Petro-Chemical Corporation Union, who has now been in jail for over 12 years after having been convicted for high treason for maintaining contacts with the FTUB (under section 122(1) of the Penal Code);
- the killing of Saw Mya Than, FTUB member and official of the Kawthoolei Education Workers’ Union (KEWU), who was allegedly murdered by the army in retaliation for a rebel attack, and in respect of whose murder the Committee on Freedom of Association had requested the Government to institute an independent inquiry in the framework of Case No. 2268;
- the disappearance on 22 September 2007 of Lay Lay Mon, a female labour activist who is a former political prisoner, after helping organize workers to support protesting monks and citizens in the uprising in Yangon; she was believed to be incarcerated in Insein prison but there was no news of if, or when, she would be brought to trial;
- the disappearance of labour activist Myint Soe during the last week of September 2007 after being active in engaging with workers to increase their involvement in the September uprising;
- the arrest by the military authorities on 8 and 9 August 2006 of seven members of the family of the FTUB member and activist Thein Win at their house in the Kyun Thayar section of Pegu city. Three of Thein Win’s siblings (Tin Oo, Kyi Thein and Chaw Su Hlaing) were sentenced to 18 years in jail under sections 17(1) and (2) of the Unlawful Associations Act. Tin Oo was reported to have suffered such intensive torture during detention that he has now become mentally unstable and there are fears for his health;

- the arrest in March 2006, and subsequent sentencing, of five underground democracy and labour activists for a variety of offences connected to efforts to provide information to the FTUB and other organizations considered as illegal by the regime, and to organize peaceful anti-State Peace and Development Council (SPDC) demonstrations (U Aung Thein, 76 years old, sentenced to 20 years; Khin Maung Win, sentenced to 17 years; Ma Khin Mar Soe, 17 years; Ma Thein Thein Aye, 11 years; and U Aung Moe, 78 years old, sentenced to 20 years);
- the intimidation by the army of the 934 workers at Hae Wae Garment, located in South Okkapala Township in Yangon, who went on strike on 2 May 2006 to demand better terms and conditions of work. The 48 workers allowed to meet with the authorities were forced to sign a written statement that indicated that there were no problems at the factory;
- the arrest and sentencing to a four-year prison term with hard labour of Naw Bey Bey, an activist member of the Karen Health Workers' Union (KHWU);
- the arrest, torture and killing of Saw Thoo Di (aka Saw Ther Paw), a Karen Agricultural Workers' Union (KAWU) committee member from Kya-Inn township, Karen State, by an armed column of Infantry Battalion 83 outside his village on 28 April 2006;
- the shelling of the Pha village with mortars and rocket propelled grenades by Light Infantry Battalion 308 which had been sent by the SPDC military upon learning that, on 30 April 2006, the FTUB and Federation of Trade Unions – Kawthoolei (FTUK) were preparing a May Day workers' rights commemoration; and
- the arrest, torture, and sentencing by a special court established in prison of ten FTUB activists to prison sentences, from three to 25 years, for having used satellite phones to convey information to the ILO and to the international trade union movement through an intermediation by the FTUB.

The Committee notes that the Government reiterates in its report that the six persons arrested for allegedly participating in the May Day event, including Thurein Aung, were not workers. The Government's report adds that no workers were sanctioned for the exercise of trade union activities, that workers have the right to request the respect of their rights, individually or collectively, that thousands of workers do so annually and that no worker has taken any action as regards May Day activities. Furthermore, the Committee notes that during the meeting of the Conference Committee, the Government representative reiterated that the Ministry of Home Affairs had declared the FTUB to be a terrorist organization and that it could therefore not be recognized as a legitimate workers organization.

The Committee notes that the Conference Committee observed with extreme concern that many people remained in prison for exercising their rights to freedom of expression and association, despite calls for their release, and that it urged the Government immediately to put an end to the practice of persecuting workers or other persons for having contact with workers' organizations, including those operating in exile, and called upon the Government to ensure the immediate release of Thurein Aung, Wai Lin, Nyi Nyi Zaw, Kyaw Kyaw, Kyaw Win and Myo Min, as well as all other persons detained for exercising their basic civil liberties and freedom of association rights.

The Committee can only deplore the fact that the Government has not provided any information, in its report, on the situation of the numerous persons referred to above and fails to provide any evidence of the measures taken to implement the Committee's previous requests, in particular as regards the need to establish independent investigations into these matters. Once again, the Committee deeply regrets the paucity of the information provided, which is in stark contrast to the extreme gravity of the issues raised by the ITUC.

The Committee recalls that respect for the right to life and other civil liberties is a fundamental prerequisite for the exercise of the rights contained in the Convention and workers and employers should be able to exercise their freedom of association rights in a climate of complete freedom and security, free from violence and threats. Furthermore, as regards the reported torture, cruelty and ill-treatment, the Committee once again points out that trade unionists, like all other individuals, should enjoy the safeguards provided by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and governments should give the necessary instructions to ensure that no detainee suffers such treatment (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 30).

Finally, the Committee recalls that while trade unions are expected under Article 8 of the Convention to respect the law of the land, "[t]he law of the land shall not be such as to impair, nor shall it be so applied as to impair, the guarantees provided for in this Convention", the authorities should not interfere with legitimate trade union activities through arbitrary arrest or detention and allegations of criminal conduct should not be used to harass trade unionists by reason of their union membership or activities.

The Committee therefore once again most deeply deplores the serious allegations of murder, arrest, detention, torture and sentencing to many years of imprisonment of trade unionists for the exercise of ordinary trade union activities. The Committee once again strongly urges the Government to provide information on the measures adopted and instructions issued so as to ensure respect for the fundamental civil liberties of trade union members and officers and to take all necessary measures to secure the immediate release of Thurein Aung, Wai Lin, Nyi Nyi Zaw, Kyaw Kyaw, Kyaw Win, Myo Min, and all those who have been imprisoned for the exercise of trade union activities and to ensure that no worker is sanctioned for the exercise of such activities, in particular for having contacts with workers' organizations of his/her own choosing.

Furthermore, recalling that the right of workers and employers to freely establish and join organizations of their own choosing cannot exist unless such freedom is established and recognized both in law and in practice, the Committee once again urges the Government to indicate all measures taken, including instructions issued, to ensure the free operation of any form of organization of collective representation of workers, freely chosen by them to defend and promote their economic and social interests, including organizations which operate in exile.

Legislative framework. In its previous comments, the Committee recalled the issues it has been raising over the years with respect to the legislative framework, including the prohibition of trade unions and the absence of any legal basis for freedom of association in Myanmar (repressive anti-union legislation, obscure legislative framework, military orders and decrees further limiting freedom of association, a single trade union system established in the 1964 Law and an unclear constitutional framework); the FTUB forced to work underground and accused of terrorism; “workers’ committees” organized by the authorities; the repression of seafarers even overseas and the denial of their right to be represented by the Seafarers’ Union of Burma, which is affiliated to the FTUB and the International Transport Workers’ Federation (ITF).

The Committee further recalls that, for several years, it has indicated that there exist some pieces of legislation containing serious restrictions to freedom of association or provisions which, although not directly aimed at freedom of association, can be applied in a manner that seriously impairs the exercise of the right to organize. More specifically: (i) Order No. 6/88 of 30 September 1988 provides that the “organizations shall apply for permission to form to the Ministry of Home and Religious Affairs” (section 3(a)), and states that any person found guilty of being a member of, or aiding and abetting, or using the paraphernalia of, organizations that are not permitted, shall be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to three years (section 7); (ii) Order No. 2/88 prohibits the gathering, walking or marching in procession by a group of five or more people regardless of whether the act is with the intention of creating a disturbance or of committing a crime; (iii) the Unlawful Association Act of 1908 provides that whoever is a member of an unlawful association, or takes part in meetings of any such association, or contributes or receives or solicits any contribution for the purpose of any such association, or in any way assists the operations of any such association, shall be punished with imprisonment for a term which shall not be less than two years and more than three years and shall also be liable to a fine (section 17.1); (iv) the 1926 Trade Union Act requires that 50 per cent of workers must belong to a trade union for it to be legally recognized; (v) the 1964 Law Defining the Fundamental Rights and Responsibilities of the People’s Workers establishes a compulsory system for the organization and representation of workers and imposes a single trade union; and (vi) the 1929 Trade Disputes Act contains numerous prohibitions of the right to strike and empowers the President to refer trade disputes to courts of inquiry or to industrial courts. Finally, the Committee recalled that there was no legal basis for the respect for, and realization of, freedom of association and that the broad exclusionary clause of article 354 of the Constitution subjects the exercise of this right “to the laws enacted for State security, prevalence of law and order, community peace and tranquillity or public order and morality”.

The Committee notes that during the June 2010 meeting of the Conference Committee, the Government representative stressed that, in accordance with its roadmap, Myanmar was committed to pursuing its transformation to a democratic society, that freedom of association rights, as well as other basic civil liberties provided for in the new Constitution would set out the framework within which new trade union legislation would be developed, and that no one has been, or is, apprehended for implicit or explicit exercise of the rights derived from the Convention. The Committee notes that the Conference Committee, recalling the long-standing and fundamental divergences between the national legislation and practice, on the one hand, and the Convention, on the other, and observing that the Government itself has admitted that there could be no legal trade unions in the country as yet, once again urged the Government in the strongest terms to immediately adopt the necessary measures and mechanisms to ensure all workers and employers the rights provided for under the Convention and to repeal Orders Nos 2/88 and 6/88, as well as the Unlawful Association Act. The Conference Committee further emphasized that it was crucial that the Government take all necessary measures to ensure a climate wherein workers and employers could immediately exercise their freedom of association rights without fear, intimidation, threat or violence.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the drafting process of legislation on workers’ organizations will be based on three pillars: the new Constitution, continued assistance and advice from the ILO and the Convention. The Committee also notes that the Government indicates that the Pyidaungsu Hluttaw (i.e. Union Assembly/Parliament) will take the necessary measures, after the 2010 elections, to repeal Orders Nos 2/88 and 6/88, the Unlawful Association Act as well as Declaration No. 1/2006. The Government’s reports adds that the first draft of the legislation on workers’ organizations was completed in May 2010 and that it consists of 15 chapters addressing, inter alia, issues linked to the organization, duties, rights, fundraising and disbursement. Furthermore, the Government indicates that this first draft has been submitted to the Attorney-General for legal opinion; that the Government is considering requesting the technical assistance from the Office in this respect and that the Union of Myanmar Federation of Chambers of Commerce and Industry (UMFCCI) as well as the workers’ representatives will be consulted and their views will be taken into consideration to further improve the instrument. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the draft legislation referred to and invites the Government to avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office.

In these circumstances, noting that the planned general elections took place on 7 November 2010, the Committee urges the Government to take, without delay, the necessary measures so that the Pyidaungsu Hluttaw will immediately, upon its constitution, repeal Orders Nos 2/88 and 6/88 as well as the Unlawful Association Act and Declaration No. 1/2006, so that they will no longer be applied in a manner that would infringe upon the rights of workers' and employers' organizations. The Committee also requests the Government to ensure that the necessary measures are taken without delay for the elaboration of a Trade Union Law that will fully guarantee the right of workers to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, without previous authorization and to provide a copy of the legislation once adopted.

The Committee once again urges the Government to furnish a detailed report on the concrete measures taken, with the full and genuine participation of workers and employers from all sectors of society regardless of their political views, to enact legislation guaranteeing, to all workers and employers, the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, as well as the rights of these organizations to exercise their activities and formulate their programmes and to affiliate with federations, confederations and international organizations of their own choosing without interference from the public authorities. It requests the Government to communicate any relevant draft laws, orders or instructions in this regard so that it may examine their conformity with the provisions of the Convention.

Finally, the Committee encourages the Government to avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office in this regard.

Extension of ILO mandate. The Committee notes that the Conference Committee, recalling its previous conclusion that the persistence of forced labour could not be disassociated from the prevailing situation of a complete absence of freedom of association and the systematic persecution of those who tried to organize, reiterated its previous request to the Government to accept an extension of ILO presence to cover the matters relating to the Convention. Recalling that the Government had indicated in its previous report that an extension of ILO presence to cover the matters related to the Convention was under consideration, the Committee once again expresses the firm hope that the Government will be in a position to accept such an extension in the very near future and requests the Government to provide information in this respect.

Namibia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1995)

Article 2 of the Convention. Right to organize of prison staff. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that section 2(2)(d) of the Labour Act excludes members of the Namibian prison service from the Labour Act's provisions, unless the Prisons Service Act, 1998 (Act No. 17 of 1998), provides otherwise. The Committee further noted, in this regard, that the Prisons Service Act does not provide for the extension of the new Labour Act's guarantees to the Namibian prison service; nor does it contain any provisions establishing their freedom of association rights.

The Committee had noted the Government's indication that it was willing to consider the issue, and that it is therefore thought appropriate to first consult widely with all the relevant parties before a decision is taken on whether to amend the Labour Act or the Prisons Service Act in order to give effect to the principles of freedom of association and the right to organize, as well as to provide for effective mechanisms to deal with and resolve labour disputes. The Committee notes that, in its report, the Government indicates that it is in the process of consulting in the Cabinet with the hope that permission will be granted to proceed with the legislative amendments that are required. In these circumstances, the Committee once again expresses the hope that the necessary legislative amendments to guarantee to the prison service the rights provided under the Convention will be adopted in the near future and requests the Government to indicate, in its next report, any developments in this regard.

Finally, the Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 24 August 2010 on the application of the Convention, and in particular on the arrests of trade unionists who were participating in strike pickets. The Committee recalls that the detention of trade union members for trade union activities is contrary to the principles of freedom of association. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in this respect.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1995)

Article 6 of the Convention. Rights of prison staff. The Committee had previously noted that section 2(2)(d) of the Labour Act excludes members of the prison service from the Labour Act's provisions, unless the Prisons Service Act provides otherwise, and had also noted that the Prisons Service Act does not provide for the extension of the new Labour Act's guarantees to the prison service. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that it is in the process of consulting Cabinet with the hope that permission will be granted to proceed with the legislative amendments that are required. In these circumstances, the Committee once again expresses the hope that the necessary legislative amendments to guarantee, to the prisons services, the rights provided under the Convention will be adopted in the near future and once again requests the Government to indicate, in its next report, any developments in this regard.

International Trade Union Confederation comments. The Committee notes the comment of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 24 August 2010 concerning difficulties in the application of the Convention in the export processing zones. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Nepal

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1996)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 24 August 2010 concerning anti-union dismissals, threats against trade union members and the weakness of collective bargaining, since collective agreements only cover a very small percentage of workers in the formal economy. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon in its next report.

In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that articles 12 and 30 of the Interim Constitution, which entered into force in 2007, guarantee the right to organize and engage in collective bargaining. Noting also that the Civil Service Ordinance Act had been amended by the Civil Service Act, so as to restore the right of public employees (up to Gazetted Third Class) to organize and bargain collectively, the Committee had requested the Government to specify which categories of public employees included in the gazetted and non-gazetted classes were covered by the legislative recognition of the right to organize and engage in collective bargaining. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that civil servants from the lowest level up to the highest level (i.e. gazetted third class) can exercise the right to organize and collective bargaining. The Committee also notes that the Government indicates that it is in the process of drafting a new Constitution and that it will strive to ensure that the laws and regulations are compatible with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide, in its next report, examples of collective agreements concluded by civil servants as well as information on any progress made in that respect in the framework of the legislative reform.

Furthermore, the Committee notes that pursuant to article 53(1) of the Civil Service Act, civil employees have the right to form a trade union at the national level and that pursuant to article 53(3), the “authentic trade union of civil employees shall have the right to submit own professional demands and conduct social dialogue and collective bargaining at the concerned institution at the district, departmental and national levels”. The Committee notes that this section further indicates that in the case of not forming the “authentic trade union of civil employees”, the “trade union of civil employees” formed pursuant to paragraph (1) may conduct collective bargaining with mutual consent of each other. The Committee requests the Government to clarify in its next report the distinction between “authentic trade unions of civil employees” and other trade unions of civil employees, and to provide information on the procedure established to determine the most representative organization of civil employees entitled to collective bargaining, if any.

Finally, in its previous observation, the Committee had raised certain issues in relation to the Draft National Labour Commission Act, in the following way.

Article 1 of the Convention. Anti-union discrimination. In its previous observation, the Committee had noted from the Government’s report that based on the constitutional provision concerning discrimination and article 23(a) of the Trade Union Act 1992, which explicitly discourages anti-union discrimination in respect of employment, there have hardly been any acts of anti-union discrimination brought to the notice of the authorities. The Committee had also noted that the Government had indicated that maximum protection against acts of anti-union discrimination will be explicitly ensured through the upcoming labour market reform and the revision of the related laws by the tripartite task force. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the provision of the Constitution on discrimination, together with article 23(a) of the Trade Union Act are the sole provisions regarding this matter. The Committee recalls that Article 1 of the Convention guarantees workers adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and that legislation prohibiting acts of discrimination is inadequate if it is not coupled with effective, expeditious procedures and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions to ensure their application (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraphs 223 and 224). The Committee therefore, once again, requests the Government to take the necessary measures to introduce in the legislation: (i) an explicit prohibition of all prejudicial acts committed against workers by reason of their trade union membership or participation in trade union activities at the time of recruitment, during employment or at the time of dismissal (e.g. transfers, demotions, refusal of training, dismissals, etc.); and (ii) effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions in cases of violation of this prohibition. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made thereon in its next report.

Article 2. Acts of interference. In its previous comments, the Committee had raised the need to ensure the enactment of a provision providing protection to workers’ and employers’ organizations against acts of interference by one another, including effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions guaranteeing adequate protection of trade unions against acts of interference in their establishment, functioning or administration and, in particular, against acts that are designed to promote the establishment of workers’ organizations under the domination of employers’ organizations, or to support workers’ organizations by financial or other means, with the objective of placing such organizations under the control of employers or employers' organizations. The Committee had noted from the Government's report that although there is no explicit provision against such activities in the legislation, interference is hardly practised; and that the issue shall be addressed in the course of the labour market reform. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the labour market reform has not been completed but that it is fully aware of the concerns of the Committee in this respect. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated to introduce in the legislation a prohibition of acts of interference, as well as rapid appeal procedures and dissuasive sanctions against such acts. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made thereon in its next report.

Article 4. Collective bargaining. Compulsory arbitration. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that, according to article 9(4) of the draft National Labour Commission Act, the National Labour Commission will have the power, in applying the Essential Services Act 1957 and article 30 of the Trade Union Act, to arbitrate interests disputes in the hotel and transportation sectors as well as in cases where the authorities consider that the economic development of the country so requires. The Committee notes that the Government does not provide information in this respect in its report. The Committee recalls that compulsory arbitration to end a collective labour dispute or a strike is acceptable only if it is at the request of both parties involved in a dispute or if the strike in question may be restricted – i.e. in the case of disputes in the public service involving public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or in essential services in the strict sense of the term, namely those services whose interruption would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population (General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraphs 256–258). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that compulsory arbitration can only take place in accordance with the abovementioned principles and to provide information on any progress made thereon in its next report.

Composition of arbitration bodies. In its previous observation, the Committee had noted that Article 6 of the draft National Labour Commission Act provides that the Appointment Committee responsible for determining the composition of the National Labour Commission shall consist, inter alia, of two persons duly nominated by the Federation of Nepal Chamber of Commerce and Industry. The Committee had recalled that any decision concerning the participation of workers' and employers' organizations in a tripartite body – especially one entrusted with mediation, conciliation and arbitration proceedings – should be taken in full consultation with all the organizations whose representativity has been objectively proven, with a view to ensure that the tripartite body enjoys the confidence of these organizations. The Committee had requested the Government to avoid any reference to the Federation of Nepal Chamber of Commerce and Industry or to any other organization in the draft National Labour Commission Act, and to refer rather to the “most representative” employers' organization. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that it welcomes this suggestion. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made thereon in its next report.

The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the conformity of the National Labour Commission Act with the abovementioned principles as regards all the abovementioned issues and to provide a copy of the Act once adopted.

Measures to promote collective bargaining. In its previous observation, the Committee had noted from the Government's report that Strategy No. 3.2.6 of the Labour and Employment Policy 2062 states that collective bargaining – which included at that time 155 collective agreements at the level of plants and eight at national level – will be encouraged through legal and institutional provisions and by building an environment conducive to the organization of workers and employers in the informal economy. The Committee notes that the Government does not provide any further information in this respect in its report. The Committee therefore, once again, requests the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the measures taken or contemplated to promote collective bargaining as well as statistical data on the scope of the collective agreements that have already been concluded, and the number and categories of workers covered.

The Committee reminds the Government that, if it so wishes, it may have recourse to the technical assistance of the Office to address the legal issues raised above.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the Netherlands Trade Union Confederation (FNV) in a communication dated 30 August 2010.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union discrimination. In its previous observation, the Committee had invited the Government to initiate discussions with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations with a view to identifying appropriate means for addressing the issue of the protection against acts of anti-union discrimination other than dismissal (for instance, transfer, relocation, demotion and deprivation or restriction of remuneration, social benefits or vocational training) of trade union members who are not trade union representatives. The Committee recalled that Article 1 of the Convention requires protection against all acts of anti-union discrimination for all “workers” with the only possible exceptions contained in Article 6 of the Convention. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the most representative employers’ and workers’ organizations will be approached on this issue and that these discussions are to be concluded by the end of 2010, after which the Government possibly – dependent upon the results of the consultation – will consider any further steps. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any progress made to ensure a comprehensive protection against acts of anti-union discrimination.

Comments of the FNV. In its previous observation, the Committee had requested the Government to provide its reply on the comments made by the FNV in 2008 concerning the impact which an opinion published by the Netherlands Competition Authority (NMA) had had in practice, by discouraging negotiations with employers at the sectoral level, on the terms and conditions of contract labour (i.e. performed by individuals who do not necessarily work under the strict authority of the employer and who may have more than one workplace). The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that a collective labour agreement may contain provisions about the self-employed and that there have been no practical cases so far in which the NMA, or in second instance the court, has judged that there is a problem with such agreements containing provisions about the self-employed. The Committee also notes that the FNV recalls that in its 2007 opinion document, the NMA expressed the view that a collective labour agreement which contains provisions on contract labour should be nullified, since the contract worker is considered to be an undertaking pursuant to the competition law and that, as a result, employers have reacted with an unwillingness to renegotiate conditions of labour, especially in the performing arts sector. The FNV also indicates that its affiliate “FNV KIEM”, which represents workers in the performing arts sector, took the State to court, and that the case is still pending. Recalling that Article 4 of the Convention establishes the principle of free and voluntary collective bargaining and the autonomy of the bargaining parties, the Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the outcome of this judicial process.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 3 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee had asked the Government to amend or repeal section 374(a)–(c) of the Penal Code and section 82 of Ordinance No. 159 of 1964, which prohibited the right to strike by public employees under threat of imprisonment.

The Committee had noted that, in the Government’s opinion, the abovementioned provisions are in conformity with the Convention, as they do not prohibit public employees from striking. According to the Government, section 374(a) of the Penal Code refers to imprisonment or fine of a public official in the case when he or she, while performing his or her duties, acts with the aim to cause stagnation or to permit the continuation of stagnation, neglects or refuses to perform labour corresponding to his or her inherent duties as a public official. The Government further indicated that section 82(2) of Ordinance No. 159, which states that punishment may be exacted on public employees who neglect or refuse to perform labour as any good public official is expected to perform is aimed at an individual’s refusal to perform his or her duties, and not at collective or individual strikes. The Government further indicated that the Penal Code will not be affected by a revision of the labour legislation as the Penal Code falls under the competency of the Ministry of Justice. However, the Code is currently under evaluation by a special committee established in March 2003. It is estimated that its work will be completed in approximately two years. After the evaluation period, the work on the suggested amendments will commence.

The Committee recalls that, in its 1992 report, the Government acknowledged that strikes by public employees, including teachers in the public sector, were forbidden by law (section 347(a)–(c) of the Penal Code and section 82 of Ordinance No. 159 of 1964), although in practice public employees had resorted to strikes on several occasions and that the local courts had considered such strikes to be legal on condition that they were justified. The Committee recalls that the principle whereby the right to strike may be limited or prohibited in the public service or in essential services would become meaningless if legislation defined the public services or essential services too broadly. The Committee considers that the prohibition should be limited to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or to services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population. Noting that the Penal Code is currently under evaluation, the Committee hopes that the Code, as well as section 82 of Ordinance No. 159, will be reviewed in accordance with the Committee’s comments and asks the Government to indicate any progress in this respect. The Committee reminds the Government that it may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office if it so wishes.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes the Government’s reply to the comments of 26 August 2009 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) concerning the application of the Convention. The Committee also notes the ITUC’s new comments, dated 24 August 2010, on matters already raised by the Committee, and on acts of violence against trade unionists in the export processing zones – the maquila sector. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

Article 3 of the Convention. Right of workers' organizations to freely organize their activities and formulate their programmes. The Committee has been referring for several years to the need for measures to amend sections 389–390 of the Labour Code which provide for compulsory arbitration of a dispute where 30 days have elapsed since the calling of the strike. The Committee notes that in response the Government states that: (i) this provision on no account alters the rights of trade union organizations to carry out their activities peacefully and freely; (ii) provision is made for compulsory arbitration because of the social and economic conditions in Nicaragua; and (iii) the economic structure of enterprises established in the country cannot sustain a socio-economic crisis of more than 30 days. The Committee recalls that arbitration imposed by the authorities on their own initiative is difficult to reconcile with the principle of the voluntary nature of negotiation (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 258), and in so far as compulsory arbitration obstructs the exercise of the right to strike, it violates the right of trade unions to organize their activities in full freedom, and could only be justified in the context of the public services, or essential services in the strict sense of the term (services the interruption of which could endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population) or in the event of an acute national crisis. In these circumstances, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary steps to amend sections 389–390 of the Labour Code to take account of the abovementioned principles. It also requests the Government, in its next report, to provide information on any measures taken to this end.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1967)

In its previous comments on the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), the Committee asked the Government to hold an inquiry into the allegation of anti-union dismissals in export processing zones and various enterprises. The Committee notes in this connection the information supplied by the Government referring to the rights and remedies established by law that apply to export processing zones, and the measures taken to promote collective bargaining, including the establishment of a Tripartite Labour Committee for Export Processing Zones, which signed agreements in 2009 and 2010 for the benefit of workers, which cover the fundamental Conventions of the ILO. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the exercise of trade union rights in export processing zones, including the number of trade union organizations and the size of their membership, the number of collective agreements signed and their coverage, complaints filed for anti-union discrimination, etc.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and observes that it does not refer to the question raised in its previous observation which read as follows.

Articles 3 and 10 of the Convention. Provisions on requisitioning. The Committee recalls that, for many years, it has been asking the Government to amend section 9 of Ordinance No. 96-009 of 21 March 1996 regulating the exercise of the right to strike of state officials and officials of territorial communities so as to restrict its scope only to cases in which work stoppages are likely to provoke an acute national crisis, to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State, or to essential services in the strict sense of the term. The Government had previously indicated that the revision of the abovementioned Ordinance was before the National Tripartite Committee responsible for the implementation of the recommendations produced by the brainstorming meetings to discuss the right to strike and the representativity of organizations. However, in its 2006 report, the Government indicated that the revision of the Ordinance had been hindered by the lack of agreement between the social partners and the Government and by problems relating to the representativity of trade union organizations. The Committee notes with regret that, in its latest report, the Government still does not provide an account of the measures taken to amend section 9 of Ordinance No. 96-009 despite the Committee's repeated requests. The Committee trusts that the Government will not fail to take without delay all the necessary measures to that end and recalls the possibility of seeking technical assistance from the Office in that regard.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee recalls that in its previous observation, it had noted the Trade Union (Amendment) Act (2005) and draws the attention of the Government to the following points.

Article 2 of the Convention. Legislatively imposed trade union monopoly. In its previous comments, the Committee had raised its concern over the legislatively imposed trade union monopoly and in this respect, it requested the Government to amend section 3(2) of the Trade Union Act, which restricts the possibility of other trade unions from being registered where a trade union already exists. The Committee noted that there is no such amendment in the language of the Trade Union (Amendment) Act. The Committee reiterates that under Article 2 of the Convention, workers have the right to establish and to join organizations of their own choosing without distinction whatsoever (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 45). It therefore urges the Government to amend section 3(2) of the principal Trade Union Act so as to ensure that workers have the right to form and join organizations of their own choosing even if another organization already exists.

Organizing in export processing zones (EPZs). The Committee had noted the Government's statement that the Federal Ministry of Labour and Productivity is still in discussion with the EPZ authority on the issues of unionization and entry for inspection in the export processing zones. The Committee notes the ITUC's comments, according to which section 13(1) of the Nigeria Export Processing Zones Authority Decree (1992) makes it difficult for workers to form or join trade unions as it is almost impossible for worker representatives to gain free access to the EPZs. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures in the near future to ensure that EPZ workers are guaranteed the right to form and join organizations of their own choosing, as provided by the Convention, and to transmit a copy of any new laws adopted in this respect. It further requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that representatives of workers' organizations have reasonable access to EPZs in order to appraise the workers in the zones of the potential advantages of unionization.

Organizing in various government departments and services. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to amend section 11 of the Trade Union Act, which denied the right to organize to employees in the Customs and Excise Department, the Immigration Department, the Prison Services, the Nigerian Security Printing and Minting Company Limited, the Central Bank of Nigeria, and Nigeria Telecommunications. The Committee notes that this section was not amended by the Trade Union (Amendment) Act. The Committee had noted that according to the Government's statement, the Collective Labour Relations Bill, pending before the lower chamber of Parliament will address this issue. The Committee recalls that workers, without distinction whatsoever, shall have the right to establish and to join organizations of their choosing and that the only exceptions authorized by the Convention are members of the police and armed forces, who should be defined in a restrictive manner and should not include, for example, civilian workers in the manufacturing establishments of the armed forces. Furthermore, the functions exercised by employees of customs and excise, immigration, prisons and preventive services should not justify their exclusion from the right to organize on the basis of Article 9 of the Convention (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 55 and 56). The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 11 of the Trade Union Act, which is still in force, and indicate the progress made towards the adoption of the Collective Labour Relations Bill and send a copy of the legislation, once it is adopted.

Minimum membership requirement. The Committee had previously expressed its concern over section 3(1) of the Trade Union Act requiring 50 workers to form a trade union. The Committee considers that even though this minimum membership would be permissible for industry trade unions, it could have the effect of hindering the establishment of enterprise organizations, particularly in small enterprises. In these circumstances, the Committee is therefore bound to reiterate that this number is too high and requests the Government to take the necessary measures to reduce the minimum membership requirement, particularly in respect of enterprise trade unions, and thus ensure the right of workers to form organizations of their own choosing.

Article 3. The right of organizations to organize their administration and activities and to formulate programmes without interference from the public authorities. Export processing zones (EPZs). The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that workers in EPZs have the right to freely organize their administration and activities and to formulate their programmes without interference by the public authorities, including through the exercise of industrial action. While noting the Government's indication that the EPZ authority is not opposed to trade union activities and that the Federal Ministry of Labour and Productivity is still in discussion on this issue, the Committee reiterates its previous request and expects that the necessary measures will be taken without delay so as to ensure that workers in EPZs enjoy the rights under the Convention.

Administration of organizations. The Committee recalls that, in its previous comments, it had requested the Government to amend sections 39 and 40 of the Trade Union Act in order to limit the broad powers of the registrar to supervise the union accounts at any time and to ensure that such a power was limited to the obligation of submitting periodic financial reports, or in order to investigate a complaint. The Committee notes that these sections were not amended under the new legislation and that the Government refers to the Collective Labour Relations Bill. The Committee trusts that the new legislation to which the Government refers will address this matter.

Right to strike. Compulsory arbitration. The Committee had noted that section 30, as amended by subsection (6)(d) of the Trade Union (Amendment) Act, continues to rely on the Trade Disputes Act to restrict strike action through the imposition of a compulsory arbitration procedure leading to a final award. The Committee has already pointed out on several occasions that such a restriction, which is binding on the parties concerned, constitutes a prohibition which seriously limits the means available to trade unions to further and defend the interest of their members, as well as their right to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. Furthermore, the Committee notes the ITUC's comments, according to which section 4(e) of the Nigeria Export Processing Zones Authority Decree (1992) impedes trade unions from handling the resolution of disputes between employers and employees by granting this responsibility to the authorities managing these zones. The Committee recalls that arbitration imposed by the authorities at the request of one party is generally contrary to the principle of the voluntary negotiation of collective agreements, and thus the autonomy of bargaining partners (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 257). The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 7 of Decree No. 7 of 1976, amending the Trade Disputes Act in order to limit the possibility of imposing compulsory arbitration to only essential services in the strict sense of the term, public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or in the case of acute national crisis. Also, the Committee requests the Government to amend section 4(e) of the Nigeria Export Processing Zones Authority Decree (1992) in order to guarantee the autonomy of the bargaining partners without giving the right to the authorities to impose compulsory arbitration.

Majority required to declare a strike. The Committee had noted that section 6 of the Trade Union (Amendment) Act amends section 30 of the principal Act by inserting subsection (6)(e), which requires the observance of a simple majority of all registered trade union members for the calling of a strike. The Committee considers that if a member State deems it appropriate to establish in its legislation provisions which require a vote by workers before a strike can be held, it should ensure that account is taken only of the votes cast (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 170). It therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the new section 30(6)(e) accordingly, so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention.

Restrictions relating to essential services. The Committee had noted with concern that section 6 of the new Act relies on the definition of “essential services” provided for in the Trade Disputes Act (1990) to restrict participation in a strike. Specifically, the Trade Disputes Act defines “essential services” in an overly broad manner so as to include, among others, services for or in connection with: the Central Bank of Nigeria, the Nigerian Security Printing and Minting Company Limited, any corporate body licensed to carry out banking business under the Banking Act, the postal service, sound broadcasting, maintaining ports, harbours, docks or aerodromes, transportation of persons, goods or livestock by road, rail, sea or river, road cleaning, and refuse collection. The Committee recalls that essential services are only those the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 159). It once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the Trade Disputes Act’s definition of “essential services”.

The Committee reminds the Government that in order to avoid damages which are irreversible or out of all proportion to the occupational interests of the parties to the dispute, as well as damages to the third parties, namely the users or consumers who suffer the economic effects of collective disputes, the authorities could establish a system of minimum service in services which are of public utility rather than impose an outright ban on strikes, which should be limited to essential services in the strict sense of the term (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 160).

Restrictions relating to the objectives of a strike. The Committee had noted with concern section 30 of the Trade Union Act as amended by section 6(d) of the new Act, limiting legal strikes to disputes constituting a dispute of rights, defined as “a labour dispute arising from the negotiation, application, interpretation or implementation of a contract of employment or collective agreement under the Act or any other enactment of law governing matters relating to terms and conditions of employment”, as well as to a dispute arising from a collective and fundamental breach of employment or collective agreement on the part of the employee, trade union or employer. The Committee considers that the legislation appears to exclude any possibility of a legitimate strike action to protest against the Government’s social and economic policy affecting workers’ interests. The Committee recalls that organizations responsible for defending workers’ socio-economic and occupational interests should, in principle, be able to use strike action to support their position in the search for solutions to problems posed by major social and economic policy trends which have a direct impact on their members and on workers in general, in particular as regards employment, social protection, and the standard of living (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 165). Therefore, it requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 6 of the new Act so as to ensure that workers enjoy the full right to strike and, in particular, to ensure that workers’ organizations may have recourse to protest strikes aimed at criticizing the Government’s economic and social policies without sanctions.

Other restrictions. The Committee had noted that section 42(1)(B) of the Trade Union Act, as amended, requires that “no trade union or registered federation of trade unions or any member thereof shall in the course of any action compel any person who is not a member of its union to join and strike or in any manner whatsoever, prevent aircraft from flying or obstruct public highways, institutions or premises of any kind for the purpose of giving effect to the strike”. The Committee observes that this section appears to provide for two prohibitions: firstly, with regard to compelling non-union members to participate in a strike action and, secondly, the prohibition to obstruct public highways, institutions or premises of any kind for the purpose of giving effect to the strike. The Committee recalls that taking part in picketing and firmly but peacefully inciting other workers to keep away from their workplace should not be considered unlawful. The case is different, however, when picketing is accompanied by violence or coercion of non-strikers. As to the second prohibition, the broad wording of this section could potentially outlaw any gathering or strike picket. The Committee recalls that the conditions that have to be fulfilled under the law in order to render a strike lawful should be reasonable and, in any event, not such as to place substantial limitation on the means of action open to trade union organizations. In addition, given that aircraft-related services, with the exception of air traffic controllers, are not in themselves considered to be essential services in the strict sense of the term, a strike of workers in that sector or related services should not be the subject of an overall ban, as could be implied from the wording of this section. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 42(1)(B) so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention and the above principles, so as to ensure that any restrictions placed on strike actions aimed at guaranteeing the maintenance of public order are not such as to render any such action relatively impossible or ban it for certain workers beyond those in essential services in the strict sense of the term.

Sanctions against strikes. The Committee had noted that section 30 of the Trade Union Act, as amended by section 6(d) of the new Act, makes strikers liable to the possibility of both paying a fine and being imprisoned up to six months, which might lead to a penalty which is disproportionate to the seriousness of the violation. The Committee recalls that no penal sanction should be imposed against a worker for having carried out a peaceful strike and therefore measures of imprisonment should not be imposed on any account. Such sanctions could be envisaged only where during a strike, violence against persons or property or other serious infringements of rights have been committed, and can be imposed pursuant to legislation punishing such acts. Nevertheless, even in the absence of violence, if the strike modalities had the effect of making the strike illegitimate, proportionate disciplinary sanctions may be imposed against strikers. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to amend its legislation so as to bring it into conformity with the principle above.

Article 4. Dissolution by administrative authority. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to amend section 7(9) of the Trade Union Act by repealing the broad authority of the Minister to cancel the registration of workers’ and employers’ organizations, as the possibility of administrative dissolution under this provision involved a serious risk of interference by the public authority in the very existence of organizations. The Committee had noted the Government’s statement that this matter will be addressed in the Collective Labour Relations Bill. Noting that section 7(9) of the principal Act is still in force, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend it and to provide a copy of the new legislative Act once it is adopted.

Articles 5 and 6. The right of organizations to establish federations and confederations and to affiliate with international organizations and the application of the provisions of Articles 2, 3 and 4 of the Convention to federations and confederations of employers’ and workers’ organizations. The Committee had noted that section 8(a)(1)(b) and (g) of the new Act requires federations to consist of 12 or more trade unions in order to be registered. In this respect, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the practical application of this requirement and, in particular, the level at which federations are established.

The Committee expresses the firm hope that appropriate measures will be taken in the very near future to make necessary amendments to the laws referred to above in order to bring them into full conformity with the Convention. It requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in 2009. The Committee recalls that the 2008 ITUC comments concerned violations of the right to strike, arrest and detention of strikers, police repression during demonstrations and the refusal to recognize a trade union. The Committee requests the Government to submit its observations on all comments submitted by the ITUC.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

The Committee notes with deep concern the comments presented by the ITUC in 2010 concerning violence against trade union leaders and members, including the murder of a trade union leader and serious physical assaults against trade union members. The Committee recalls that freedom of association can only be exercised in conditions in which fundamental rights, and in particular, those relating to human life and personal safety, are fully respected and guaranteed, and that the killing or serious injury of trade union leaders and trade unionists requires the institution of independent judicial inquiries in order to shed full light, at the earliest date, on the facts and the circumstances in which such actions occurred and in this way, to the extent possible, determine where responsibilities lie, punish the guilty parties and prevent the repetition of similar events. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in this respect.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee noted the comments on the application of the Convention made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 26 August 2009. The ITUC states that in the private sector collective bargaining rights are restricted by the requirement of government approval: collective agreements on wages must be registered with the Ministry of Labour, which decides whether the agreement becomes binding according to the Wages Board and Industrial Councils Act. The ITUC also refers to acts of anti-union discrimination, including threats of dismissal made to trade unionists in several companies in the banking sector. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations respecting these matters.

The Committee noted the comments submitted by the ITUC in a communication dated 29 August 2008, concerning refusals to negotiate with trade unions, acts of interference by employers, anti-union practices against workers' representatives, including dismissals. The Committee requests the Government to submit its observations thereon and to reply to the matters raised by the Committee's previous comment.

Bill on collective labour relations. The Committee noted the Government's statement, according to which the National Assembly has not yet passed the bill on collective labour relations. The Committee recalls that ILO technical assistance has been provided to the authorities and hopes that the future legislation will be in full conformity with the requirements of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to send the new law once adopted.

Comments made by the Organization of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU) and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) (now International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC)) on the application of the Convention. The Committee notes the comments. The comments concerned in particular the fact that: (1) certain categories of worker are denied the right to organize (such as employees of the Customs and Excise Department, the Immigration Department, the Nigerian Security Printing and Mining Company Limited, the prison service and the Central Bank of Nigeria) and therefore are deprived of the right to collective bargaining; (2) only unskilled workers are protected by the Labour Act against anti-union discrimination by their employer; (3) every agreement on wages must be registered with the Ministry of Labour, which decides whether the agreement becomes binding according to the Wages Board and Industrial Council Acts according to the Trade Dispute Act (it is an offence for an employer to grant a general or percentage increase in wages without the approval of the Minister); (4) section 4(e) of the 1992 Decree on Export Processing Zones states that "employer-employee" disputes are not matters to be handled by trade unions but rather by the authorities managing these zones; and (5) section 3(1) of the same Decree makes it very difficult for workers to form or join trade unions as it is almost impossible for worker representatives to gain free access to the export processing zones (EPZs). The Committee requests the Government to send its reply on these comments.

Concerning the abovementioned point (1), the Committee observed that the Committee on Freedom of Association had underlined that the functions exercised by employees of customs and excise, immigration, prisons and preventive services should not justify their exclusion from the right to organize on the basis of Article 9 of Convention No. 87 (see 343rd Report of the Committee on Freedom of Association, paragraph 1027). The Committee requests the Government to amend section 11 of the Trade Union Act (1973) so that these categories of workers are granted the right to organize and to bargain collectively, as well as for all public employees not engaged in the administration of the State.

The Committee underlines the seriousness of the matters previously raised and requests the Government to take measures as a matter of urgency to ensure full respect for the rights enshrined in the Convention.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Finally, the Committee requests the Government to provide its comments concerning the 2010 observations of the ITUC.

Pakistan

Right of Association (Agriculture) Convention, 1921 (No. 11) (ratification: 1923)

The Committee notes the comments made by the Pakistan Workers' Federation (PWF) in a communication dated 30 July 2010, reporting that agricultural workers have no right to freedom of association.

In its previous observations, the Committee observed that small agricultural holdings which do not run an establishment, or farmers working on their own or with their family, appeared to be excluded from the Industrial Relations Ordinance (IRO) 2002 and therefore from the provisions on freedom of association. The Committee noted that the 2008 Industrial Relations Act (IRA), which amended the 2002 IRO, was an interim law due to lapse on 30 April 2010. The Committee also noted that a tripartite conference had to be held to draft a new legislation in consultation with all stakeholders.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the 2002 IRO did not expressly exclude agricultural undertakings from its application. It adds that there are no restrictions whatsoever on the workers employed in agriculture to form a trade union and that although no trade union of agricultural workers was registered, there were numerous agricultural workers' associations in place to safeguard their interests. The Committee also notes that the Government enacted the 18th Constitutional Amendment, which transferred responsibility for labour issues from the federal to the provincial governments. The Committee further notes that on 18 June 2010, the High Court of Sindh (Karachi), referring to the 18th Constitutional Amendment, confirmed that the 2008 IRA stood repealed and concluded that the 1969 IRO was now once again in force. The Committee recalls in this respect that it had previously noted that while agriculture was not expressly excluded from the IRO 1969, it was not expressly included and that the definitions given in the IRO could be interpreted as excluding small agricultural workers like self-employed farmers, sharecroppers, tenants and smallholders, from its application. The Committee expresses the firm hope that new legislation will be adopted in the very near future in full consultation with the social partners concerned. The Committee further hopes that any adopted legislation will be in full conformity with the Convention. It requests the Government to provide a copy of the relevant legislative texts once they have been adopted.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1951)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the All Pakistan Federation of United Trade Unions (APFUTU) dated 8 March 2010 regarding the difficulties in registering trade unions for the industries established in the City of Sialkot, as well as the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 24 August 2010 concerning acts of violence against protesters, night-time raids, arrests and harassment against trade union leaders and members, as well as other violations of the Convention. The Committee notes in particular the comments of the ITUC concerning the requirement that any gathering of more than four people be subject to police authorization and its impact on trade union activities, as well as the denial of the right to strike to workers in export processing zones (EPZs) and the possibility to impose penalties of imprisonment against illegal strikes, go-slows and picketing activities. The Committee recalls that freedom of association can only be exercised in a climate that is free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind against leaders and members of workers' organizations, and that workers have the right to participate in peaceful demonstrations to defend their occupational interests. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on all these matters in its next report.

The Committee also notes the comments made by the Pakistan Workers' Federation (PWF) dated 30 July 2010 concerning the legal vacuum with regard to the regulation of industrial relations as the Industrial Relations Act (IRA) of 2008 expired on 30 April 2010, in particular as concerns national industry-wide trade unions. In this respect, the Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that it has enacted the 18th Amendment to the Constitution whereby the matters relating to industrial relations and trade unions are devolved to the provinces. The Government adds that it will ensure that provincial legislations will be in accordance with the Convention. The Committee further notes that on 18 June 2010, the High Court of Sindh (Karachi), referring to the 18th Constitutional Amendment, confirmed that the IRA 2008 stood repealed and concluded that the Industrial Relations Ordinance (IRO) of 1969 was now once again in force. The Committee recalls in this respect that it had previously commented on a number of significant restrictions on the right to organize under the IRO 1969 and in particular: (i) the exclusion from the IRO of public servants of grade 16 and above, of forestry, railway and hospital workers, of agricultural workers like self-employed farmers, sharecroppers and smallholders, as well as of persons employed in an administrative or managerial capacity whose wages exceeded 800 rupees per month (far below the national minimum wage); and (ii) restrictions on the rights to strike. The Committee notes that while some provincial governments have moved to pass their own legislation based on the expired IRA 2008, it expresses its concern over the exercise of their rights by national industry-wide trade unions, the activities of which may be jeopardized in the absence of a national legislation dealing with industrial relations and trade union rights.

The Committee expresses the firm hope that new legislation will be adopted in the country in the very near future with the full consultation of the social partners concerned. The Committee further hopes that any adopted legislation will be in full conformity with the Convention. It requests the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the developments with regard to the adoption of national and/or provincial legislations on trade unions and industrial relations and to provide a copy of these instruments once adopted. It reminds the Government that it may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office if it so wishes.

Export processing zones (EPZs). With regard to the right to organize in EPZs, the Committee recalls that it had previously noted the Government's statement that the Export Processing Zones (Employment and Service Conditions) Rules, 2009 had been finalized in consultation with the stakeholders and will be submitted to the Cabinet for approval. Noting the Government's statement that the draft Rules are in conformity with the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on their adoption, as well as a copy thereof as soon as they are adopted.

Banking sector. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to amend section 27-B of the Banking Companies Ordinance of 1962, which restricted the possibility of becoming an officer of a bank union only to employees of the bank in question, under penalty of up to three years' imprisonment, either by exempting from the occupational requirement a reasonable proportion of the officers of an organization, or by admitting, as candidates, persons who have been previously employed in the banking company. The Committee noted the Government's statement that a bill to repeal section 27-B of the Banking Companies Ordinance of 1962 was submitted to the Senate. The Committee notes that the Government provides, with its report, a copy of the amendment submitted to the Senate and indicates that, as underlined in its Labour Policy 2010, it is committed to repeal this section. The Committee notes in this respect the conclusions of Case No. 2096 of the Committee on Freedom of Association in which it has been requesting amendment of this Ordinance for many years. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Amendment of section 27-B of the Banking Companies Ordinance of 1962 will be adopted in the near future and requests the Government to provide information in this respect in its next report.

Furthermore, recalling that Presidential Ordinance No. IV of 1999, which amends the Anti-Terrorism Act by penalizing illegal strikes or slowdowns with up to seven years' imprisonment, would be contrary to the Convention, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate whether this Ordinance is still in force.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1952)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received.

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 24 August 2010 containing allegations of numerous violations of trade union rights in law, as raised by the Committee below, and in practice. The Committee notes, in particular, the allegations of anti-union dismissals and acts of interference in trade union internal affairs by private employers (intimidation, non-recognition and blacklisting of trade unions and its members), as well as denial of collective bargaining in export processing zones (EPZs). The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

The Committee recalls that for several years it has been commenting on serious discrepancies between national legislation and the Convention. At its 2008 session, the Committee took note of the Industrial Relations Act (IRA), adopted in November 2008, which amended the Industrial Relations Ordinance (IRO) 2002. It further noted that the IRA was an interim law due to lapse until 30 April 2010. In this respect, the Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report on the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), that it has enacted the 18th Amendment to the Constitution whereby the matters relating to industrial relations and trade unions are devolved to the provinces. The Government adds that it will ensure that provincial legislations will be in accordance with the Conventions it has ratified. The Committee further notes that on 18 June 2010, the High Court of Sindh (Karachi), referring to the 18th Constitutional Amendment, confirmed that the IRA 2008 stood repealed and concluded that the Industrial Relations Ordinance (IRO) of 1969 was now once again in force. The Committee recalls in this respect that it had previously commented upon on a number of significant restrictions on the right to organize under the IRO 1969 and in particular: (1) the exclusion from the IRO of public servants of grade 16 and above, of forestry, railway and hospital workers, of agricultural workers like self-employed farmers, sharecroppers and smallholders, as well as of persons employed in an administrative or managerial capacity whose wages exceeded 800 rupees per month (far below the national minimum wage); (2) lack of sufficient legislative protection for workers dismissed for their trade union membership or activities; and (3) denial of free collective bargaining in the public banking and financial sectors. The Committee expresses the firm hope that any new legislation whether at the provincial or national level will be adopted in the very near future with the full consultation of the social partners concerned. The Committee further hopes that any adopted legislation will be in full conformity with the Convention. It requests the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the developments with regard to the adoption of provincial legislations on trade unions and industrial relations and to provide a copy of these instruments once adopted. It reminds the Government that it may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office if it so wishes.

Export processing zones (EPZs). With regard to the right to organize in EPZs, the Committee recalls that it had previously noted the Government's statement that the Export Processing Zones (Employment and Service Conditions) Rules, 2009 had been finalized in consultation with the stakeholders and will be submitted to the Cabinet for approval. Noting the ITUC comments alleging denial of collective bargaining rights in EPZs and the Government's statement that the draft Rules are in conformity with the Convention, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the Rules will be adopted in the very near future. It requests the Government to provide a copy thereof as soon as they are adopted.

Banking sector. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to amend section 27-B of the Banking Companies Ordinance of 1962, imposing sanctions of imprisonment and/or fines for carrying out trade union activities during office hours. The Committee notes that the Government had provided a copy of the amendment submitted to the Senate and indicates that, as underlined in its Labour Policy 2010, it is committed to repeal this section. The Committee notes in this respect the conclusions of Case No. 2096 of the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Amendment of section 27B of the Banking Companies Ordinance of 1962 will be adopted in the near future and requests the Government to provide information in this respect in its next report.

Autonomous bodies and corporations. The Committee had previously noted the statement of the All Pakistan Federation of Trade Unions (APFTU), according to which the newly imposed section 2-A of the Services Tribunal Act had debarred workers engaged in autonomous bodies and corporations such as the Pakistan Water and Power Development Authority (WAPDA), railway, telecommunication, gas, banks, the Pakistan Agricultural Storage and Supply Corporation (PASSCO), etc., from seeking redress for their grievances from the labour courts, labour appellate tribunals and the National Industrial Relations Commission (NIRC) in the case of unfair labour practices committed by the employer. In this respect, the Committee had noted the Government's indication that a Bill for amendment of this provision has been moved to the Senate. The Committee once again expresses the firm hope that section 2-A of the Services Tribunals Act will be repealed in the near future so as to ensure that appropriate means of redress are available to workers concerned. It requests the Government to provide a copy of the amended legislative text.

The Committee had previously requested the Government to take all necessary measures to ensure that workers of the Karachi Electric Supply Company (KESC) and the trade union existing at the enterprise enjoyed the rights afforded by the Convention in practice. It furthermore requested the Government to provide information on the situation with regard to the determination of a collective bargaining agent. The Committee notes, from the examination of Case No. 2006 of the Committee on Freedom of Association, the Government's indication that the referendum for selecting a collective bargaining agent had been held in accordance with the directive of the Sindh High Court, and that the KESC labour union was declared the collective bargaining agent (357th Report, paragraph 48).

Finally, the Committee expresses its concern at the situation of trade union rights in the country and urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the application in law and in practice of the rights enshrined in the Convention.

Panama

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1958)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the previous comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) concerning murders and acts of violence against trade unionists. The Committee also notes the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2706. The Committee further notes the comments of the ITUC dated 24 August 2010, which refer to the refusal of the Government to grant trade union status to the National Union of Workers of the University of Panama (SINTUP), and in general report that workers are victims of persecution and murders. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in this respect. The Committee recalls that freedom of association can only be exercised in a climate that is free of violence and in which fundamental human rights are respected and fully guaranteed. The Committee also requests the Government to provide its observations in relation to the comments made by the National Council of Private Enterprise (CONEP) in 2009.

The Committee recalls that for many years it has been commenting on the following matters, which raise problems of consistency with the Convention:

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers without distinction whatsoever to establish and join organizations.

- sections 174 and 178 of Act No. 9 on administrative careers establishing, respectively, that there may not be more than one association in an institution, and that associations may have provincial or regional chapters, but not more than one chapter per province. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that Act No. 9 of 1994 was amended by Act No. 43 of 30 July 2009, but that sections 174 and 178 have not been amended. The Committee recalls that, in accordance with Article 2 of the Convention, the legislation should envisage the possibility of workers being allowed to establish more than one organization if they so wish. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend sections 174 and 178 of the Act on administrative careers as indicated above;
- the requirement of too large a membership (ten) for the establishment of an employers' organization and an even larger membership (40) for the establishment of a workers' organization at the enterprise level, by virtue of section 41 of Act No. 44 of 1995 (amending section 344 of the Labour Code), and the requirement of a large number (40) of public servants to establish an organization of public servants under section 177 of Act No. 9 on administrative careers (now section 182 of the Single Text of Act No. 9). The Committee notes the Government's indication that Act No. 43 of 30 July 2009 amends section 182 referred to above, raising the required number of members for the establishment of an organization of public servants from 40 to 50. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to reduce the minimum number of members required so that workers, employers and public servants are able to establish their organizations. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any developments in this respect;

- the denial to public servants (non-career public servants, as well as those holding appointments governed by the Constitution and those who are elected and serving) of the right to establish unions. The Committee notes the Government's indication that to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention it would be necessary to amend article 64 of the Political Constitution, which is a matter for the highest authorities of the country. The Committee recalls that it has always considered that the exclusion of public servants from the right to organize is contrary to the Convention (see the General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 48). The Committee observes that the legislation grants public servants the right to establish associations for the defence of their interests. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that all public servants, including non-career public servants, as well as those holding appointments governed by the Constitution and those who are elected and serving, are able to establish and join the organizations or associations of their own choosing in full freedom (and not only one organization for each institution), thereby guaranteeing such organizations the rights set out in the Convention.

Article 3. Right of organizations to elect their representatives in full freedom.

- the requirement to be of Panamanian nationality in order to serve on the executive board of a trade union (article 64 of the Constitution). The Committee notes the Government's indication that to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention, it would be necessary to amend article 64 of the Political Constitution, which is a matter for the highest authorities of the country. The Committee recalls once again that provisions on nationality that are too stringent could deprive some workers of the right to elect their representatives in full freedom; for example, migrant workers could be adversely affected in sectors in which they account for a significant share of the membership. In the Committee's view, the national legislation should allow foreign workers to take up trade union office at least after a reasonable period of residence in the host country (see the General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 118). In this respect, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to make the required amendments taking into account the principle referred to above;
- the right of organizations to organize their administration. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 180-A of Act No. 24 of 2 July 2007, amending Act No. 9 on administrative careers, so as to abolish the requirement for public servants who are not affiliated to associations to pay ordinary trade union dues, with the possibility of providing instead for the payment of a lesser amount than the ordinary trade union contribution for the benefits derived from collective bargaining. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that, on the occasion of the most recent amendment of Act No. 9 of 1994, section 180-A was not amended. The Committee recalls once again that the requirement by law that non-affiliated public servants shall pay ordinary dues to the association which obtained improvements in labour conditions raises problems of consistency with the Convention as such a requirement may influence the right of public servants to choose freely the association that they wish to join. Under these conditions, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures for the amendment of section 180-A of Act No. 24 of 2 July 2007 as indicated above.

Right of organizations to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes in full freedom. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it commented on various aspects related to the exercise of the right to strike. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's general comments relating to the exercise of the right to strike to the effect that: (1) strikes in Panama, as a constitutionally recognized right, take place within legally established limits set out in the Labour Code; (2) the right to strike per se does not give entitlement to the payment of wages for the days of stoppage, even where it is declared legal; (3) conciliation as a procedure for the resolution of collective labour disputes occurs in accordance with specific rules initiated by the presentation of a list of claims; (4) the abandonment of conciliation does not give rise to "disproportionate penalties", although it brings an end to the procedures; if this step is taken by the employer, it not only precludes the conciliation stage, but sets in motion the period of twenty days for the workers to call a strike; if it is taken by the workers, the latter have to recommence their action; (5) procedures have been established for the settlement of disputes of right involving the interpretation of the law, and primarily through mediation; (6) there are no formalities governing requests for mediation, although where the dispute is such as to admit the exercise of the right to strike, the parties may also request it through the submission of a list of claims; (7) the provision referred to above gives rise to another settlement mechanism, as in the case of the list of claims and the National Labour Act, under the terms of Act No. 53 of 1975, which provides for a jurisdictional body; and (8) although machinery is established in labour law for the settlement of collective disputes, it is not adequate.

The Committee recalls that the following matters raise problems of conformity with the Convention:

- denial of the right to strike in export processing zones (section 49B of Act No. 25 of 1992) and the denial of the right to strike in enterprises of less than two years' standing (section 12 of Act No. 8 of 1981). The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Ministry of Labour and Employment Development (MITRADEL), together with the Ministry of Trade and Industry (MICI), have been working to formulate amendments on this subject, resulting in the formulation of a preliminary draft Bill to amend, among other provisions, section 49 of Act No. 25 of 1992 and to repeal section 12 of Act No. 8 of 1981. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of any developments in this respect and to provide a copy of the final text when it has been adopted;
- the denial of the right to strike for public servants. The Committee recalls that the banning of strikes in the public service should be restricted to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 158) or to essential services in the strict sense of the term (those the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population). The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the right to strike of public servants who do not exercise authority in the name of the State;

- the ban on federations and confederations from calling strikes and on strikes against the Government’s economic and social policy, and the unlawfulness of strikes that are unrelated to an enterprise collective agreement. The Committee recalls once again that federations and confederations should have the right to strike and that organizations responsible for defending workers’ socio-economic and occupational interests should, as a rule, be able to use strike action to support their position in the search for solutions to problems posed by major social and economic trends which have a direct impact on their members and on workers in general, in particular as regards employment, social protection and the standard of living (see the General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 165). The Committee once again requests the Government to take steps for the amendment of the legislation so as to align it with the principles described above and so that the right to strike is not restricted to strikes related to a collective agreement;
- the authority of the Regional or General Labour Directorate to refer labour disputes to compulsory arbitration in order to stop a strike in private transport enterprises (sections 452 and 486 of the Labour Code) which do not provide a service that is essential in the strict sense of the term. The Committee notes the indication that the right to strike as a constitutionally recognized right, is exercised within the legally established limits set out in the Labour Code, and its comment that mediation and conciliation procedures are available. The Committee recalls that compulsory arbitration to end a collective labour dispute is acceptable if it is in all cases at the request of both of the parties involved in the dispute. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the legislation so as to provide that compulsory arbitration is possible in the transport sector only at the request of both parties;
- the obligation to provide minimum services with 50 per cent of the staff in the transport sector, and the penalty of summary dismissal of public servants for failure to comply with minimum services in the event of a strike (sections 152.14 and 185 of Act No. 9 of 1994 on administrative careers). In this respect, the Committee notes the adoption of Executive Decree No. 25 of June 2009, which provides in section 2 that the provisions of the Labour Code respecting strikes in public services shall be applicable to the public air and maritime passenger transport services (sections 485–488 respecting strikes in public services) and of Executive Decree No. 26 of June 2009, which provides that in cases in which striking workers in a public service have designated an insufficient number of workers to provide or cover emergency services through shifts, the Ministry, in taking action to increase the percentage of workers up to the 30 per cent allowed by the law (section 487(2) of the Labour Code), shall justify the decision using criteria such as: (a) it is a situation in which the life, safety and health of the population are placed at risk; (b) if the original conditions for the provision of services determined by the workers were maintained, the normal living conditions of citizens could be seriously affected and/or an economic, social or political crisis created with serious consequences; and (c) the existence of the source of employment for workers and the enterprise would be imperilled. The decision adopted by the authority is immediately enforceable. The Committee finally notes that the legislation does not refer to the possible participation of the organizations of workers concerned in the determination of the minimum services envisaged in those public services, which go beyond essential services in the strict sense of the term. The Committee emphasizes that minimum services should be limited to activities that are strictly necessary to cover the basic needs of the population or to satisfy the minimum requirements of the service, while maintaining the effectiveness of the pressure brought to bear, and that since this system restricts one of the essential means of pressure available to workers to defend their economic and social interests, their organizations should be able, if they so wish, to participate in defining such a service. Moreover, in the case of any disagreement as to the number and duties in relation to the minimum service, such disagreement should be settled by an independent body enjoying the confidence of the parties. The Committee once again requests the Government, taking into account the principles described above, to take the necessary steps to ensure the respective legislative amendments;
- legislation interfering with the activities of employers’ and workers’ organizations (sections 452.2, 493.1 and 494 of the Labour Code) (closure of the enterprise in the event of a strike and compulsory arbitration at the request of one of the parties). The Committee previously requested the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that: (1) in the event of a strike, management staff and non-striking workers are guaranteed the right to enter the facilities; and (2) compulsory arbitration is possible only at the request of both parties to the dispute, in essential services in the strict sense of the term or in the case of public servants exercising authority in the name of the State. The Committee notes the adoption of Act No. 68 of 26 October 2010 amending, among other provisions, sections 493–494 of the Labour Code. The Committee notes with satisfaction new section 493(3) which, in accordance with the comments made by the Committee for several years, provides that “the owners, directors, managing director, the staff closely involved in these functions and workers in positions of trust shall be able to enter the enterprise during the strike, provided that their purpose is not to recommence productive activities”. The Committee nevertheless notes that the free access of non-striking workers is not provided for in the event of a strike. The Committee once again requests the Government to take steps to ensure that in the event of a strike the right of entry of non-striking workers to the facilities is guaranteed;
- the obligation for non-members to pay a solidarity contribution in recognition of the benefits derived from collective bargaining. The Committee notes that section 2 of Act No. 68, amending section 405 of the Labour Code, provides that “the collective agreement shall apply to all persons who work in the categories covered by the agreement, in the enterprise, commerce or establishment, even though they are not members of the union. Non-unionized workers who benefit from the collective agreement shall be obliged, during the period covered by the collective agreement, to pay the ordinary and extraordinary dues agreed by the union, and the employer shall be obliged to check such dues off from wages and forward them to the union". In this respect, the Committee considers that "solidarity" dues in view of the benefits derived from collective bargaining by workers who are not members of the unions concluding a collective agreement are not contrary to the provisions of the Convention; nevertheless, such dues should be set at an amount which does not prejudice the right of workers to join the trade union organization of their choosing. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps for the amendment of the legislation as indicated above, and to provide information in its next report on any measure adopted or envisaged in this respect,

- the automatic intervention of the police in the event of a strike. The Committee notes section 3 of Act No. 68, amending section 493(1) of the Labour Code, which provides, as amended, that "once the strike has commenced, the Regional or General Labour Inspectorate or Directorate shall immediately give orders for the police authorities to duly guarantee or protect persons and property." The Committee considers, in cases of strike movements, that the authorities should resort to the use of the public forces only in grave situations or those in which public order is seriously threatened. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take steps for the amendment of the legislation as indicated above.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report, with regard to the requested legislative amendments, that on various occasions it has shown its will to adapt the national legislation to the provisions of the Convention. However, as this involves the amendment of the Labour Code, as well as of other legal provisions, it is very difficult to engage in a process of the amendment of this legal instrument, as it necessarily involves the will, dialogue and consensus between workers and employers, in accordance with the practice in Panama. The Government adds that regrettably up to now no consensus has been achieved in this respect, for which reason the National Government, with a view to complying with this international commitment and reflecting the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 98th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2009) and the comments of the Office, has requested the technical assistance of the ILO with a view to addressing the issues relating to freedom of association, in order to seek ways forward to allow the harmonization of national law and practice with the provisions of the Convention. Observing that the discrepancies between the law and practice and the Convention have existed for many years, and taking into account the gravity of some of the restrictions referred to above, the Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures to bring the legislation into conformity with the provisions of the Convention and that the requested technical assistance will be provided in the very near future. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any progress achieved in this respect.

Legislative initiatives. The Committee notes the adoption of Legislative Decree No. 27 of 5 June 2009 adopting measures intended to preserve the independence and autonomy of workers' trade union organizations.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee takes note of the information supplied by the Government relating to the comments of 2009 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the National Federation of Public Employees and Public Service Enterprise Workers (FENASEP). It takes note that the Government's report makes no mention of the comments of 29 May 2009 by the National Council of Private Enterprise (CONEP). The Committee also notes the ITUC's comments of 24 August 2010 concerning: (1) obstacles to collective bargaining and to the right to organize in the public sector; (2) threats, harassment and mass dismissals of trade unionists. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations thereon as well as on the CONEP's observations of 2009.

The Committee recalls that for many years it has been commenting on the following matters, which raise problems of consistency with the Convention:

Article 4 of the Convention. Promotion of collective bargaining.

- (a) Section 12 of Act No. 8 of 1981 provided that in the first two years of operation, enterprises (other than building enterprises) were not bound to conclude a collective labour agreement, which could in practice imply denial of the right to collective bargaining. The Committee notes the Government's statement in response that the Ministry of Labour and Workforce Development (MITRADEL), together with the Ministry of Commerce and Industry (MICI), have been working on the requested amendments, preparing a preliminary draft that would repeal section 12 of Act No. 8 of 1981 thus allowing collective agreements to be concluded at any time. The Committee notes the Government's statement that the preliminary draft is now in its final phase. The Committee notes, however, that section 7 of Act No. 29 of 29 June 2010 provides that "societies (personas naturales) or legal persons established in the Special Economic Area of Barú shall not be required to conclude collective labour agreements in the first six years of operation", which again could imply in practice a denial of the right to collective bargaining. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of any developments in the preliminary draft that would repeal section 12 of Act. No. 8 of 1981 and to send a copy of the final text once it has been adopted. The Committee also asks the Government to repeal section 7 of Act. No. 29 of 29 June 2010 and to safeguard fully the right to collective bargaining of the workers in question.

- (b) The need to amend the legislation so that in the event of a strike attributable to the employer, the payment of wages for strike days is not imposed by law (section 514 of the Labour Code) but is a matter for collective bargaining between the parties concerned. CONEP pointed out in this connection that the legislation does not require any proof, prior to the strike, that a collective agreement was breached or legal provisions repeatedly violated. The Committee notes that the Government provides no information on this matter. Consequently, it reiterates its previous recommendation and again asks the Government to send information and to ensure that the payment of wages in the event of a strike may be settled by collective bargaining.
- (c) The requirement that the number of representatives of the parties in negotiations shall be from two to five (section 427 of the Labour Code). The Committee notes that the Government supplies no information in response. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to amend this provision (for example by providing that the parties shall decide on their representation) and to provide information on the matter.

Restrictions on collective bargaining in the maritime sector. In earlier comments, the Committee took note of restrictions on collective bargaining in the maritime sector pursuant to section 75 of Legislative Decree No. 8 of 1998, establishing the conclusion of collective agreements as an option, which in practice leads to the denial of workers' claims by employers and about which an application had been filed for this legislation to be found unconstitutional. The Committee also took note of the Government's information that a draft of a new Maritime Code would be submitted to the Legislative Assembly. The Committee notes that according to the Government, MITRADEL, the MICI and the Maritime Authority of Panama (AMP) are preparing the first draft of a resolution providing for measures to fulfil the collective rights of seafarers in the interest of ensuring observance of the right to organize, bargain collectively and declare strikes. The Committee also notes the information that the AMP and MITRADEL are currently meeting in order to seek a consensus on the measures to be taken in this regard. Pointing out that seafarers must be covered by all the guarantees laid down in the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to report on all developments regarding the first draft of the resolution, the complaint asking that the employers' denial of workers' claims be ruled unconstitutional, and the draft new Maritime Code.

Article 6. Public servants' right to collective bargaining. In its previous comments the Committee noted that Act No. 24 of 2 July 2007 amending the Administrative Careers Act contains provisions that afford protection from acts of anti-union discrimination against public servants and recognizes the right to collective bargaining of associations of public servants. In view of FENASEP's assertion that the right to collective bargaining has not been regulated, the Committee asked the Government to indicate whether municipal workers and workers of decentralized institutions enjoy the right to collective bargaining.

The Committee notes in this connection the Government's indication that public servants, including municipal workers and workers in decentralized institutions, do not have this right because organizations of public servants are not considered to be trade unions and so may not negotiate collective agreements. The Government adds that in practice, public servants do form associations and make labour gains though not under the name of "collective bargaining", but they do negotiate and the agreements benefit the membership collectively. The Committee is aware of the foregoing but is bound to point out that the Convention allows exclusion from the rights and safeguards (including the right to collective bargaining) it establishes only for persons engaged in the administration of the State and for the police and armed forces, and that consequently all other public officials and employees must have the right to bargain collectively. The Committee requests the Government to take steps to ensure that the law establishes this right for public servants who are not engaged in the administration of the State.

Issues raised by employers' organizations. In its previous comments the Committee observed that CONEP was asking for regulations on legal disputes and that employers be allowed to submit claims and initiate conciliation proceedings. The Committee invited the Government to address these matters through tripartite dialogue. The Committee notes that the Government makes no reference to the matter in its report. In these circumstances, the Committee asks the Government to indicate in its next report whether a tripartite dialogue process has been set in motion and, if so, to provide the results of the discussions.

With regard to the legislative amendments requested, the Committee notes that according to its report, the Government has made known its intention of aligning the national legislation with the provisions of the Convention. Unfortunately, no consensus having been reached thus far, the National Government, in the interests of meeting this international commitment and in keeping with the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 98th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2009), and pursuant to the offer made by the Office, has requested, in document No. DM.1400.2009, technical assistance from the Office in dealing with freedom of association issues, in order to seek compromise solutions allowing national law and practice to be brought into line with the provisions of the Convention. Observing that there has been divergence between law and practice for many years, and bearing in mind the seriousness of some of the restrictions mentioned, the Committee hopes that the technical assistance requested will be forthcoming in the very near future and will allow the legislation to be aligned with the Convention, and asks the Government to provide information on all progress in this matter in its next report.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1976)

In its previous observation, the Committee took note that the Third Draft Industrial Relations Bill, which was last revised on 14 August 2006, had replaced the 2003 Draft Industrial Relations Act, as part of an ongoing effort to review and consolidate the labour legislation. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the Sixth (final) Draft Industrial Relations Bill was finalized in December 2009. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any development in this respect and to provide a copy of the Bill once adopted.

Power of the Minister to assess collective agreements on grounds of public interest. In its previous observation, the Committee had requested the Government to amend section 32 of the Third Draft Industrial Relations Bill, which conferred a broad power on the Minister of Labour to assess collective agreements on grounds of public interest – a principle that also applied to the public sector. The draft legislation had stated that “the Minister may, on behalf of the State, appeal as of right against the making of an award or order (including an award or order made by consent) or the certification of an agreement, on the ground that the making of the award or order, or the certification of the agreement, is contrary to public interest”. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that this provision has been renumbered as section 51 of the Sixth (final) Draft Industrial Relations Bill, which provides that the powers previously conferred to the Minister are now conferred to the Attorney-General who will be acting on behalf of the State and whose powers will be subject to the approval of a Full Bench under the Industrial Relations Commission, so as to allow for him/her to appeal – on grounds of public interest – against the making of an award or order (including an award or order made by consent) or the certification of an agreement. The Committee recalls that such provision could only be compatible with the Convention if it merely stipulates that the approval of collective agreements may be refused if the collective agreement has a procedural flaw, or does not conform to the minimum standards laid down by general labour legislation (General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 251). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that section 51 of the Sixth (final) Draft Industrial Relations Bill is in conformity with the abovementioned principle, and to provide information thereon in its next report.

Compulsory arbitration. In its previous observation, the Committee had noted that sections 151 and 152 of the Third Draft Industrial Relations Bill instituted a system of compulsory arbitration when conciliation between the parties had failed. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that these sections have been repealed by sections 77 and 78 of the Sixth (final) Draft Industrial Relations Bill, which provide that a Commissioner of the Industrial Relations Commission can only begin arbitration where a conciliation proceeding is exhausted with the issues remaining unresolved; and refer to the intervention of the State in an industrial dispute where issues of public interest and public welfare come into calculation. The Committee recalls that compulsory arbitration is only acceptable if it is at the request of both parties involved in a dispute, or in the case of disputes in the public service involving public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or in essential services in the strict sense of the term, namely those services whose interruption would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that sections 77 and 78 of the Sixth (final) Draft Industrial Relations Bill are in conformity with the abovementioned principle, and to provide information thereon in its next report.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes the comments of 24 August 2010 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) referring to matters under examination by the Committee, such as the arrest of trade unionists. The Committee recalls in this connection that the detention of trade unionists on grounds related to activities carried out to defend the interests of workers is a serious violation of fundamental freedoms in general and freedom of association in particular. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations thereon.

The Committee observes that in its report the Government makes no reference to the comments the Committee has been making for many years on the legislation’s inconsistency with the provisions of the Convention. In particular, the report makes no reference to the stage reached in the enactment of the Bill which was to amend various provisions of the Labour Code in line with the Committee’s observations (the Bill had technical input from the ILO). In these circumstances, the Committee repeats its earlier comments.

The Committee reminds the Government that for many years it has been pointing out that the following provisions of the law are incompatible with the Convention:

- the requirement of an unduly large number of workers (300) to establish a branch trade union (section 292 of the Labour Code);

- the prohibition on joining more than one union even if the worker has more than one part-time employment contract, whether at the level of the enterprise or industry, occupation or trade, or institution (section 293(c) of the Labour Code);
- imposition of unduly demanding conditions of eligibility for office on the executive body of a trade union: the need to be an employee in the enterprise, industry, occupation or institution, whether active or on leave (section 298(a) of the Labour Code), to have reached the age of majority and to be an active member of the union (section 293(d) of the Labour Code);
- the requirement for trade unions to respond to all requests from the labour authorities for consultations or reports (sections 290(f) and 304(c) of the Labour Code);
- the requirement that, for a strike to be called, its sole purpose must be directly and exclusively linked to the workers' occupational interests (sections 358 and 376(a) of the Labour Code);
- the obligation to provide a minimum service in the event of a strike in public services that are essential to the community without any requirement to consult the employers' and workers' organizations concerned (section 362 of the Labour Code);
- the referral of collective disputes to compulsory arbitration (sections 284–320 of the Code of Labour Procedure).

The Committee notes the information sent by the Government on the drafting of a Bill to amend certain sections of the Labour Code and Amending Act No. 496/94, which was submitted to the President of the Republic for consideration on 5 June 2009 and that several of the Bill's provisions take account of the Committee's comments. These are: section 290(f) which limits requests for information from the labour authorities to annual statements of account; section 293(c), which allows every worker to belong to several unions on the basis of the category of work they perform; section 293(d), which extends eligibility for membership of the executive body of a trade union to non-active members; section 298(a), which provides that the general assembly shall decide on the election and removal of the authorities who must be dependent or independent workers of the enterprise, industry or occupation, whether active or on leave; sections 358 and 376, extending the purposes of a legal strike to cover not only occupational interests but also economic and social protection interests.

Furthermore, the Committee is of the view that other amendments proposed in the Bill could be improved to bring them fully into conformity with the principles of freedom of association, and in particular:

- the proposed amendment of section 292 to reduce from 300 to 100 the minimum membership for establishing a branch trade union. The Committee is of the view that, although the reduction is significant, the number of 100 workers may still be difficult to attain and ought therefore to be reduced to no more than 50. Similarly, the minimum number of workers required to establish unions in the public sector should also be reduced by half;
- the amendment of section 304(c) limiting the requirement to disclose information and data to "complaints raised by trade unionists". In the Committee's view, so as to avoid acts of interference in trade union activities, a specified percentage (for example 10 per cent) of members should be required in order to request intervention by the administration;
- the amendment of section 362 on minimum services which introduces a last sentence stating "The decision shall be sent to the organizations of workers and employers so that they participate in the determination, and in the event of disagreement shall be referred to the competent authority". In the Committee's view, any disagreement in determining minimum services should be settled by an independent body that the parties deem reliable, such as the judicial authority.

The Committee further observes that the abovementioned draft Bill proposes no amendment to sections 284–320 of the Code of Labour Procedure which cover the referral of collective disputes to compulsory arbitration. The Committee noted in an earlier observation that, according to the Government, these provisions were repealed by section 97 of the Constitution, promulgated in 1992, which provides that "the State shall facilitate conciliatory solutions to labour disputes and social dialogue. Arbitration shall be optional". The Committee again requests the Government, in accordance with the Constitution and in order to avoid any misinterpretation, to take the necessary steps to repeal sections 284–320 of the Code of Labour Procedure.

The Committee hopes that in the near future it will be able to note progress in the legislation and requests the Government to provide information in its next report on all developments in this regard.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1966)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference. The Committee notes the comments of 24 August 2010 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) referring to anti-union practices in various enterprises or public institutions in the country. The Committee asks the Government to send its observations thereon.

The Committee observes that in its report (identical to the report of 2009), the Government makes no reference to the comments the Committee has been making for many years on the inconsistency of the legislation with the provisions of the Convention, and that in particular it makes no reference to the stage reached by the Bill (for which the ILO provided technical input) to amend various sections of the Labour Code in conformity with the Committee's observations. In these circumstances, the Committee repeats its previous comments:

The Committee recalls that for many years it has been commenting on:

- the absence of legal provisions affording protection to workers who are not trade union leaders against all acts of anti-union discrimination (article 88 of the Constitution only affords protection against discrimination based on trade union preferences);
- the absence of adequate penalties for non-observance of the provisions relating to the employment stability of trade unionists and to acts of interference in workers' and employers' organizations by each other (the Committee indicated previously that the penalties laid down in the Labour Code for failure to comply with the legal provisions on this point in sections 385, 393 and 395 are not sufficiently dissuasive, except in the case of a repeat offence by the employer, when the fine is doubled); and
- the delays in the application of justice in relation to acts of anti-union discrimination and interference.

The Committee also notes that the Committee on Freedom of Association requested the Government, in consultation with the social partners, to ensure effective national procedures for the prevention and sanctioning of anti-union discrimination (see Case No. 2648, 355th Report, paragraph 963).

The Committee further recalls that the Convention guarantees to workers adequate protection against any acts of anti-union discrimination during recruitment and employment, and in respect of termination of employment, and that this protection encompasses all measures that are discriminatory in nature (dismissals, transfers, demotion). Although, as the Government points out, the law prohibits acts of interference, the Committee recalls that under the Convention, workers' and employers' organizations shall enjoy adequate protection against any acts of anti-union discrimination and interference, and emphasizes that legislative provisions are inadequate if they are not accompanied by effective and prompt procedures and sufficiently dissuasive penalties to ensure their enforcement in cases of anti-union discrimination or interference. The Committee again requests the Government to take measures to resolve these matters, for example through the draft partial reform of the Labour Code that is under examination. In this connection, the Committee requests the Government to report on the status of the reform and to provide a copy of the final text as soon as it is promulgated.

Article 6. Public officials not engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee recalls that in its previous observation it expressed the view that sections 49 and 124 of the Public Service Act afford adequate protection against the dismissal of trade union officers within the meaning of Article 1 of the Convention, but do not cover protection against dismissal and other prejudicial measures against union members because of their membership or legitimate union activities. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to establish in the legislation adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination against civil servants and public employees, including those who are not trade union leaders, and also sufficiently dissuasive sanctions for those who commit violations.

The Committee hopes that it will be able to note progress at the legislative level (particularly in relation to the forthcoming reform of the Labour Code) in the near future and again requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any developments in this respect.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

Comments from workers' organizations. The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 29 August 2008, which referred to serious acts of violence against demonstrators and the arrest of trade union leaders for participating in a strike. It notes in particular the Government's indication that the allegations are the subject of examination by the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Committee also notes the Government's indication, in relation to the previous comments of the Autonomous Confederation of Peruvian Workers (CATP) that the executive committee of the Union of Workers of the Public Ombudsman's Office was registered on 7 September 2009. Finally, with regard to the comments of the National Coordinating Committee of Contract Workers of the Ministry of Health dated 3 October 2008 challenging the administrative services contract regime governed by Legislative Decree No. 1057, the Committee notes the Government's statement that the Constitutional Court ruled that the "administrative services contract" must be interpreted as a special scheme for the hire of labour for the public sector, and declared the special administrative services contract regime established by Legislative Decree No. 1057 to be constitutional, recognizing that workers covered by this regime are entitled to exercise the right to organize and the right to go on strike.

The Committee also notes the comments from the General Confederation of Workers of Peru (CGTP), the Single Confederation of Workers (CUT), the Workers' Central Union of Peru (CTP) and the Autonomous Confederation of Workers of Peru (CATP) dated 2 and 25 August 2010 and from the ITUC dated 24 August 2010 concerning the application of the Convention and in particular that they object to: (i) article 153 of the Constitution which denies judges and prosecutors the right to organize; (ii) Legislative Decree No. 1086 of 28 June 2008 establishing the Act to promote the competitiveness, formalization and development of micro- and small enterprises and access to decent employment, which does not contain any reference to the exercise of trade union rights by workers in micro-enterprises; and (iii) the use of temporary contracts to make it difficult for workers to join trade unions. These organizations also refer to issues which have been examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Committee notes the Government's reply to the aforementioned comments and its specific indications that: (i) the prohibition on the right to organize for judges and prosecutors is based on the fact that special authority is conferred on judges for the performance of their duties, they are the highest interpreters of the law, they administer justice on behalf of the nation and exercise power deriving from the people, and prosecutors represent the State in judicial proceedings; both have prerogatives, obligations and incompatibilities which are peculiar to the nature of their posts; (ii) contrary to the indications of the trade union organizations, section 3(5) of Legislative Decree No. 1086 of 28 June 2008 prescribes observance of the right of workers to form trade unions and non-interference with the right of workers to elect, or not elect, to join or not to join, trade union organizations which have been legally established; and (iii) as regards the use of temporary contracts in order to obstruct membership to trade unions, the labour inspectorate, with a view to granting protection of the right to organize in connection with the various types of contract provided for in the legislation, has issued directives to protect the right to organize of temporary workers. Recalling the content of Article 2 of the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to guarantee that judges and prosecutors enjoy the right to form associations or organizations for the defence of their interests. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any measures taken in this respect.

In addition, the Committee notes various cases pending before the Committee on Freedom of Association relating to matters which the Committee of Experts is examining.

Article 3 of the Convention. Right of workers' organizations to organize their activities and formulate their programmes. The Committee recalls that it has been making comments for many years on section 73(b) of the Industrial Relations Act, which provides that the decision to call a strike has to be adopted in the form expressly set out in the statutes and must in any event represent the will of the majority of the workers concerned. The Committee observes that the Government does not refer to this issue in its report. The Committee recalls once again that if the legislation provides that a vote is required by workers before a strike can be held, it should be ensured that account is taken only of the votes cast, and that the required quorum or majority is fixed at a reasonable level (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 170). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the legislation taking account of this principle.

Furthermore, the Committee referred in its previous comment to the creation, by means of Ministerial Decision No. 0080-2007-ED of 23 February 2007, of the national register of supply teachers to replace teachers on strike and asked the Government to take the necessary steps to overturn the aforementioned Ministerial Decision, taking account of the fact that strikers should only be replaced in the event of a strike in an essential service in the strict sense in which strikes are prohibited by law and if the strike results in an acute national crisis. The Committee notes the Government's indication that: (i) the abovementioned register constitutes a human resources management instrument which registers all professionals who are suitable for recruitment in the public education system, in cases of the continued absence of teachers of classes in basic regular education and does not have the purpose of replacing teachers who exercise their right to strike; and (ii) the aforementioned legislation was enacted in strict observance of the principle of legality and therefore does not conflict with the right to strike established in the national legislation and ratified international Conventions. While observing that the preamble to the abovementioned Ministerial Decision refers to the hours lost owing to the absence of teachers for strikes and stoppages, the Committee requests the Government to take steps to make it clear in the Ministerial Decision that the replacement of strikers is only possible in the cases referred to above.

The Committee also recalls that in its previous comments it noted the drafting of a General Labour Bill which would repeal the Industrial Relations Act and therefore the provisions in question, and asked the Government to provide information on any legislative developments relating to this Bill. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that: (i) the workplan of the Labour Commission of the Congress of the Republic for 2010–11 gives priority to evaluation of the General Labour Bill and consideration has been given to the holding of macro-regional public hearings with the objective of improving the legislative capacity of the Commission, by means of comprehensive analysis of the labour legislation (priority will be given to the discussion of three fundamental themes for the world of work: public employment, the General Labour Bill and the special bill to promote formal employment), with the aim of achieving balance and optimum labour relations between workers and employers; (ii) the macro-regional public hearings will take place with the participation of representatives of the ILO, members of Congress and the social partners involved (trade union confederations and employers' organizations) in the matters to be the subject of legislation, with the aim of achieving an overview of the proposals in question and due analysis of the consequences for the development of the country; and (iii) the aforementioned hearings seek to strengthen the system of labour relations, in observance of the international labour standards adopted by the ILO. The Committee expresses the hope that the legislative initiatives in question will take full account of its comments and that the General Labour Bill to be adopted will be in full conformity with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any developments in this respect.

Furthermore, the Committee has been informed that in June 2010 the Labour Commission of Congress approved an opinion modifying certain sections of the Industrial Relations Act and that this opinion is to be discussed in the plenary of Congress. The Committee requests the Government to contemplate the possibility of amending the sections of the Act on which it has been commenting for many years amended in the context of this reform.

Article 6. Right of workers' organizations to establish federations and confederations. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it asked the Government to take the necessary steps to amend section 19 of Supreme Decree No. 003-82-PCM to allow federations and confederations of public servants to establish or join organizations of their own choosing. The Committee notes that the Government repeats that, under Supreme Decree No. 003-2004-TR (which created the register of trade union organizations of public servants (ROSSP)) and Directive No. 001-2004-DNRT (on guidelines for the registration of trade union organizations in the register of trade union organizations of public servants of the Ministry of Labour and Employment Promotion), federations of state workers who are covered by different labour regimes (private or public sector) are allowed to join and form confederations. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate whether, in accordance with these provisions, federations of state workers are allowed to join confederations which contain organizations of non-state workers.

The Committee is raising a number of other points in a direct request to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1964)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments of 3 October 2008 by the National Coordinating Committee of Contract Workers of the Ministry of Health.

It also notes the comments by: (1) the General Confederation of Workers of Peru (CGTP), the Central Confederation of Workers of Peru (CUT), the Workers' Central Union of Peru (CTP) and the Autonomous Confederation of Peruvian Workers (CATP), dated 2 and 25 August 2010 and referring to the breach of Articles 1–4 of the Convention; and (2) the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 24 August 2010 and referring to undue interference, anti-union practices and dismissals in the textile sector. The Committee notes the Government's reply to these comments, received on 13 October 2010.

The Committee also notes various cases currently before the Committee on Freedom of Association.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. The Committee has for several years been examining the effectiveness of the system of protection against acts of anti-union discrimination, including the matter of the efficiency of administrative and judicial procedures. In its previous comments, it noted in this connection that section 25 of the Regulations to the General Labour Inspection Act classifies interference by the employer in the freedom of association of workers or trade unions and anti-union discrimination as very serious offences. Where such offences are noted in the course of an inspection, the applicable penalty varies from 5 per cent of 11 tax units (1,925 new soles, equivalent to US$687) and 100 per cent of 20 tax units (70,000 new soles, equivalent to US$24,995), depending on the number of workers affected. The Committee asked the Government to indicate whether the penalties set in the Regulations to the General Labour Inspection Act would continue to apply once the Act is adopted.

The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the General Labour Inspection Act (Act No. 28806) and its Regulations (Supreme Decree No. 019-2006-TR), differ in terms of coverage from the draft General Labour Act. The General Labour Inspection Act and its Regulations cover the inspection activities of the Administrative Labour Authority, empowering the latter to monitor compliance with the social and labour provisions of laws, regulations and agreements and with contractual requirements, and observance of workers' fundamental labour rights, thereby giving it the authority to apply administrative sanctions when an offence is noted. As regards the draft General Labour Act, the Government states that Chapter IV of the Act regulates trade union protection in order to guarantee the free exercise of trade union rights, which enable workers or trade union organizations to take judicial action if they deem their rights to have been abused or threatened. The Committee notes the Government's statement that, even if the draft General Labour Act were to be adopted, the Administrative Labour Authority will continue, through its labour inspection system, to ensure compliance with the social and labour standards that affect the trade union rights of workers and trade unions.

As regards the length of judicial proceedings following complaints of acts of anti-union discrimination or interference, the Committee notes that a new Act on labour procedure (Act No. 29497 of 30 December 2009) has been adopted, section 2(1)(g) of which provides that it is the labour courts that hear claims relating to disputes involving a trade union and disputes between trade unions, including their dissolution. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the impact of the new Act on the length of judicial proceedings regarding complaints of acts of anti-union discrimination or interference.

Article 3. The Committee takes note of three directives issued by the Ministry of Labour and Employment Promotion to strengthen the labour inspectorate for its work relating to trade union rights, including the rights of temporary personnel, contract workers or workers engaged under service contracts. The Committee notes with interest the Constitutional Court's ruling of 7 September 2010 establishing that persons employed under administrative service contracts shall enjoy trade union rights.

Article 4. The Committee asks the Government to send information on the trade union rights enjoyed by workers employed under "vocational training schemes", and particularly the right to collective bargaining of the organizations representing them. Lastly, in view of the comments submitted by various national organizations, the Committee requests the Government to send further detailed information on the manner in which collective disputes about the level of collective bargaining are settled, both in law and in practice.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1953)

The Committee recalls that in its previous observation it noted the recommendations of the high-level mission which visited the country in September 2009, and the commitment expressed by the Government to embark upon a comprehensive technical cooperation programme on freedom of association and to create a high-level tripartite monitoring body to review the progress made in investigating and prosecuting the cases of violence brought to the attention of the ILO's supervisory machinery. The Committee had requested the Government to provide information on the progress made in establishing such a body, on its mandate and functioning. The Committee notes with interest the Government's indication that the National Tripartite Industrial Peace Council (NTIPC) was established on 20 January 2010 as a high-level monitoring body on the application of international labour standards and, in particular, of the Convention. The NTIPC mandate is to: (i) facilitate "out-of-the-box solution" to long-standing Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA) cases; (ii) monitor and report progress on active CFA cases; (iii) facilitate gathering of relevant information on complaints submitted to the ILO; and (iv) evaluate and recommend appropriate action(s). The Committee notes detailed information provided by the Government on NTIPC activity since its establishment.

The Committee welcomes the measures taken by the Government to strengthen the operational capacity of the Philippines National Police (PNP) and Armed Forces of the Philippines (AFP) aimed at fostering an enabling environment for the enjoyment of constitutionally guaranteed civil liberties and trade union rights through: (i) inclusion into the PNP Operational Procedures (POP) Manual and the Manual on Rules on Labour Disputes, Rallies and Demonstration of Human Rights Protection to be Provided to Victims and Criminals; (ii) supplementing the POP Manual with a Guidebook on Human Rights-Based Policing to provide police personnel with a basic reference on rights-based policing and to offer practical suggestions on how to mainstream international standards on human rights for law enforcement in police stations; (iii) reinforcement of Human Rights Desks in the police stations; and (iv) the campaign to dismantle all private armies. The Committee further welcomes the Government's indication that the Revised Joint Guidelines on the conduct of the PNP personnel and private security guards during strikes and lockouts will be signed before the end of 2010 after the final consultation. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the adoption of the Joint Guidelines in its next report.

The Committee also welcomes the activities conducted under the EU-Philippines Justice Support Program (EPJUST) (police and other investigative bodies, prosecutors and judiciary) aimed, among others, at: (i) enhancing the capacity and effectiveness of the Philippine justice system in the effective and timely investigations, prosecution and bringing to justice perpetrators, ensuring a fair, speedy and impartial trial of those charged with the crimes; (ii) enhancing the capacity and effectiveness of the Commission of Human Rights; and (iii) strengthening the ability of the uniformed services by training their personnel in relevant international human rights standards.

The Committee further welcomes the Government's commitment to continue working closely with the ILO, social partners and other stakeholders in establishing a technical cooperation programme to raise awareness and strengthen the capacity of all relevant government institutions and the social partners in the promotion and protection of labour rights. In this respect, the Committee notes with interest that two regional seminars were conducted in April 2010 on civil rights, freedom of association, collective bargaining, and labour law implementation and enforcement in the Philippine Economic Zones; and that a capacity-building seminar for labour justice administrators, Supreme Court justices and their legal staff will be conducted before the end of 2010.

The Committee also notes with interest that, following the high-level mission, Republic Act No. 9745 (Anti-Torture Act of 2009) was approved on 10 November 2009. The Government indicates that this reaffirms its commitment to uphold civil liberties, and human and trade rights by penalizing torture and other cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment and reinforces the earlier issuances of the Supreme Court on the Writ of Habeas Data and Writ of Amparo, noted by the Committee.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government on the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in 2009 in relation to violence against trade unionists and impunity in the country. The Committee notes that, in addition to the above, with regard to some concrete allegations, the Government undertakes to submit its observations on the relevant pending cases to the CFA, and to continue gathering information on other alleged cases and to provide its reply as soon as possible. The Committee trusts that the Government will submit this information with its next report.

The Committee further notes a communication dated 24 August 2010 from the ITUC in which it provides its comments on the application of the Convention in law and in practice. The Committee notes that some of the ITUC's comments relate to the legislative issues raised by the Committee below (restriction on foreign nationals' right to join trade unions, on the registration of trade union organizations and their activities, including the right to strike, as well as the use of the Human Security Act). The ITUC also alleges that, against a background of a high-level ILO mission to the Philippines, the killings, kidnappings, disappearances and anti-union tactics, including harassment and arrests, continued. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on these allegations.

Human Security Act. The Committee had previously requested the Government to provide information on the impact of the Human Security Act upon the application of the provisions of the Convention and to indicate the safeguards which ensure that this Act cannot be used under any circumstances as a basis for suppressing legitimate trade union activities or result in any extrajudicial killing for the exercise of trade union rights. The Committee notes the Government's indication that this law was enacted in 2007 to address terrorist activities that endanger the population. According to the Government, while the Act classifies various crimes as terrorist acts, the exercise of trade union rights (right to self-organization, peaceful concerted activities, collective bargaining, etc.) is not within its scope and that legitimate trade union activities could not be included in the rigid definition of crimes provided for in the Act. The Government points out that the apprehension of the possible abuse of the Act by the police and judicial authorities to curtail trade union activities is more imagined than real. The Government states that, since the enactment of this legislation, there appears to be no case where such abuse had been raised with respect to its implementation. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the use of the Act, if any, in cases concerning trade unionists.

Labor Code. The Committee recalls that for a number of years it has been commenting on certain discrepancies between the provisions of the Labor Code and the Convention. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that it is currently working on the proposed legislative reforms to further strengthen trade unionism and remove obstacles to the effective exercise of labour rights and that two bills are currently undergoing tripartite consultations for submission to the NTIPC prior to their filing with the appropriate Committees of both Houses of the 15th Congress. The Committee recalls that its previous comments referred to the need to bring the national legislation into conformity with the following Articles of the Convention.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, without previous authorization. The Committee had previously referred to the need to amend sections 269 and 272(b) of the Labor Code so as to grant the right to organize to all nationals lawfully residing within the Philippines (and not just those with valid permits if the same rights are guaranteed to Filipino workers in the country of the alien workers, or if the country in question has ratified either ILO Convention No. 87 or No. 98). Noting that the Government once again refers to the principle of reciprocity, the Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the measures taken to amend the above-noted sections in a manner which enables anyone legally residing in the country to benefit from the trade union rights provided by the Convention.

The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to communicate the relevant legislation which had lifted the 20 per cent requirement and the requirement to reveal the names of the officers and members, for legitimate federations and national unions. The Committee notes, in this respect, Republic Act No. 9481, which, among others, amended section 234(c) of the Labor Code. The Committee notes, however, that according to this section, as amended, the above-noted requirement is still applicable to unions seeking independent registration. The Committee recalls that the requirement of a high minimum proportion of workers before a union may be formed is contrary to the right of workers to form organizations of their own choosing (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 81). The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to amend section 234(c) of the Labor Code so as to lower the minimum membership requirement for forming an independent union and to indicate, in its next report, the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee had previously requested the Government to indicate all measures taken with a view to lowering the 30 per cent minimum membership requirement for registration of public employees' unions set forth by Executive Order No. 180 of 2004. The Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption, on 29 June 2010, by the Public Sector Labor-Management Council, of resolution No. 4 lowering the percentage of minimum membership requirement for purposes of registration and thus restoring the earlier longstanding practice, in accordance with the requests of the unions.

Article 3. Right to strike. The Committee had previously requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 263(g) of the Labor Code so as to limit governmental intervention resulting in compulsory arbitration to the essential services in the strict sense of the term only. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, within the context of the abovementioned legislative reform, the first of the abovementioned bills seeks to amend section 263(g) so as to limit the assumption of jurisdiction of the Secretary of Labor (and the President) to the ILO's concept of "essential services". The Committee further notes the Government's indication that Department Order No. 40-G-03 providing the implementing rules on the exercise of the assumption of jurisdiction power of the Secretary of Labor was adopted as an interim administrative measure on 29 March 2010. The Committee notes that, according to new section 15 of Rule XXII of the Order, “when a labor dispute causes or is likely to cause a strike in an industry indispensable to the national interest, the Secretary of Labor and Employment may assume jurisdiction over the dispute and decide it or certify the same to the National Labor Relations Commission for compulsory arbitration” either upon a request by both parties to the dispute or “after a conference called by the Office of the Secretary of Labour and Employment ... moto proprio or upon a request of petition by either parties to the labor dispute”. The Committee recalls that compulsory arbitration to end a collective labour dispute and a strike is acceptable if it is at the request of both parties involved in a dispute, or if the strike in question may be restricted, even banned, that is in the case of disputes in essential services in the strict sense of the term, namely those services whose interruption would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population. The Committee considers that the term “national interest” is too broad to fall within a strict definition of what may constitute an essential service. The Committee requests the Government to amend Department Order No. 40-G-03 so as to ensure the application of this principle. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the bill referred to by the Government will ensure that governmental interference resulting in compulsory arbitration will be limited solely to the essential services in the strict sense of the term. The Committee requests the Government to indicate all measures taken in this respect and to provide relevant statistics on the recourse had to section 263(g) in the meantime.

The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend sections 264(a) and 272(a) of the Labor Code, which provided for dismissal of trade union officers and penal liability to a maximum prison sentence of three years for participation in illegal strikes, so as to ensure that workers may effectively exercise their right to strike without the risk of being penally sanctioned. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that, within the context of the abovementioned legislative reform, the second bill removes the possibility of imposing a criminal sanction for mere participation in an illegal strike on grounds of non-compliance with the administrative requirements. The Committee recalls that no penal sanction should be imposed against a worker for having carried out a peaceful strike and on no account should measures of imprisonment be imposed. Such sanctions could be envisaged only where, during a strike, violence against persons or property or other serious infringements of rights has been committed, and can be imposed pursuant to legislation punishing such acts. The Committee expresses the firm hope that any new legislative text will ensure the application of this principle.

Right of workers’ organizations to organize their administration without interference by the public authorities. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to amend section 270 of the Labor Code, which subjected the receipt of foreign assistance to trade unions to the prior permission of the Secretary of Labor, and notes the Government’s indication that the second bill repeals this requirement.

Article 5. Right of organizations to establish federations and confederations. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to lower the excessively high requirement of ten union members for federations or national unions set out in section 237(a) of the Labor Code.

The Committee expresses the firm hope that the undertaken legislative reform will soon be completed and that the aforementioned legislative provisions will be brought into full conformity with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide in its next report information on the outcome of this reform and all relevant legislative texts so adopted.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1953)

The Committee notes a communication dated 24 August 2010 from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in which it provides its comments on the application of the Convention in law and in practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

The Committee recalls that, in its previous observation, it noted the recommendations of the High-level mission which visited the country in September 2009, and the commitment expressed by the Government to embark upon a comprehensive technical cooperation programme on freedom of association and to create a high-level tripartite monitoring body to review the progress. The Committee welcomes the extensive information provided by the Government on the measures taken in this regard as detailed in the comments on the application of Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference. The Committee notes the Government’s observation on the comments submitted by the ITUC in 2009 on the application of the Convention and, in particular, on the allegation relating to the use of contractual labour as a method to deunionize the workforce. The Committee notes, in particular, the Government’s statement that, under section 243 of the Labor Code, all employees, whether employed for a definite period of time or not, whether undergoing a period of work probation or not, may establish and join a trade union to bargain collectively. Coercing employees in the exercise of their legitimate rights to organize is a prohibited act. According to the Government, violations of the provisions of the Labor Code regulating contractual engagements would result in regularization of employment status with the contractor/subcontractor or the company.

The Committee notes that for several years it has been requesting the Government to respond to the comments made by the ITUC with regard to the alleged acts of anti-union discrimination and employer interference, as well as cases of replacement of trade unions by non-independent company unions, dismissals and blacklisting of activists in export processing zones (EPZs) and other special economic zones. The Committee regrets that no information has been provided by the Government in this respect. The Committee notes with concern further allegations of anti-union tactics in the EPZs contained in a 2010 ITUC communication, as well as the allegations of anti-union dismissal and anti-union practices at the Temic Automotive Philippines Inc. and Cirtec Electronic Corporation submitted by the Trade Federation for Metals, Electronics and Other Allied Industries-Federation of Free Workers (TF4). The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon. It further requests the Government to submit these specific allegations to the National Tripartite Industrial Peace Council (NTIPC), established on 20 January 2010 as a high-level monitoring body on the application of international labour standards, and to provide information on the assessment and recommendations made by this body.

The Committee further welcomes the two regional seminars that were conducted in April 2010 on civil rights, freedom of association, collective bargaining, and labour law implementation and enforcement in the economic zones. The Committee encourages the Government to pursue these actions aimed at strengthening the capacity of all relevant government institutions and the social partners in the promotion and protection of labour rights in EPZs.

The Committee had previously noted that certain of the reported acts of anti-union discrimination and interference related to certification procedures and elections and requested the Government to provide a copy of the relevant legislation, which, according to the Government, eliminates the employer's interference in such processes. The Committee notes that House Bill No. 1351, previously referred to by the Government, became Republic Act No. 9481 on 25 May 2007, which amended the Labor Code. The Committee notes with satisfaction new section 258-A providing that an employer is not a party to the certification process and therefore cannot oppose a petition for certification election.

The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate any developments as well as any legislative or other measures taken or contemplated to accelerate the procedures and strengthen in practice the protection available against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference, with special emphasis on EPZs and special economic zones. The Committee also once again requests the Government to provide statistical information on the number of complaints of unfair practices and inspections carried out on these matters in EPZs and special economic zones.

Article 4. Collective bargaining in the public sector. In its previous comments, the Committee took note of the Government's indication that, under section 13 of Executive Order No. 180, only terms and conditions not otherwise fixed by law may be negotiated between public sector employees' organizations and the government authorities. The Government had further stated that such matters as the scheduling of vacation leave, the work assignment of pregnant women and recreational, social, athletic and cultural activities are negotiable; however, matters relating, inter alia, to wages and all other forms of pecuniary remuneration, retirement benefits, appointment, promotion and disciplinary action were not negotiable. The Committee recalled in this connection that article 76 of the Labor Code provided that the terms and conditions of employment of all government employees, including employees of government-owned and controlled corporations, shall be governed by the civil service law, rules and regulations, and that their salaries shall be standardized by the National Assembly as provided for in the Constitution. The Committee noted, moreover, that the Public Services Labor Independent Confederation (PSLINK), in its communication dated 15 September 2008, also referred to the restrictions on bargaining rights in the public sector. The Committee notes with regret that the Government provides no information on measures taken to fully grant to public sector employees not engaged in the administration of the State the right to negotiate their terms and conditions of employment. In these circumstances, while considering that the Convention is compatible with systems requiring parliamentary approval of certain labour conditions or financial clauses of collective agreements, as long as the authorities respect the agreement adopted, the Committee stresses the importance of the development of collective bargaining in enterprises and institutions in the public sector that are covered by the Convention. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to ensure that public sector employees not engaged in the administration of the State enjoy the right to negotiate their terms and conditions of employment in accordance with Articles 4 and 6 of the Convention. It once again requests the Government to indicate the developments in this regard and provide copies of any relevant legislation adopted.

Poland

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 6 September 2010 on the application of the Convention and the Government's reply thereon.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations. The Committee takes note of the information provided by the Government in its report in relation to the 2006 ITUC comments alleging that workers in state-owned enterprises in the health sector, and water and forestry industries had their employment contracts terminated and replaced by civil law contracts depriving them of the right to belong to a trade union. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the legislation in the health sector does not specify the preferred form of employment for the practice of physicians, nurses and midwives (on the basis of employment contract or a civil law contract) and, thus, leaves the discretion for the parties concerned to decide on it. The Committee also notes that, according to the Government, the right to form and join trade unions is not granted for those individuals who have undertaken to provide employment on the basis of civil law contracts, since they cannot be considered employees under section 2 of the Labour Code. The Committee recalls that under Article 2 of the Convention, employers and workers, including workers without an employment contract, have the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing without distinction whatsoever, with the sole exception of members of the armed forces and the police. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any measures taken or envisaged to amend its legislation so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention.

Article 3. Right of organizations to elect their representatives in full freedom. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to amend section 49(6) of the Civil Service Act so as to ensure that public servants may exercise their trade union functions at all levels. The Committee notes the entry into force of the Act on Civil Service, 2008. It further notes that, according to its section 78(6), members of the civil service occupying senior positions cannot exercise trade union functions. The Committee considers that while legislation may restrict the right of civil servants in senior positions to join unions of lower grade employees, provided that the persons concerned have the right to form their own organizations to defend their interests, the right to elect representatives in full freedom, as well as the right to perform trade union functions, should be guaranteed to all workers in the public service in their respective trade union organizations. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 78(6) of the Act on Civil Service so as to ensure that civil servants may exercise their trade union functions at all levels and to indicate measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

Denial of the right to strike of public servants. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to specify categories of employees whose right to strike was restricted. The Committee notes, in this respect, the relevant provisions of the new Act on Civil Service (2(2) and 78(3)) and Annex 1 to the Ordinance of the Prime Minister of 9 December 2009 “On the Definition of Clerical Positions, Required Professional Qualifications, Clerical Degrees for Civil Servants, Multipliers for Determining the Remuneration and Detailed Rules for Determining and Paying Other Benefits to Members of the Civil Service” provided by the Government. The Committee trusts that public servants who do not exercise authority in the name of the State may exercise their right to strike. The Committee requests the Government to provide any information, in its next report, on the practical application of the right to strike by such employees.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 6 September 2010 alleging inefficiency of anti-union discrimination legal protection, and cases of intimidation of trade unionists and anti-union harassment, as well as referring to the issues raised by the Committee below. The Committee notes the Government’s reply thereon.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union discrimination. In its previous observation, the Committee had noted the allegations of inefficiency of the proceedings and sanctions established in the legislation, and also noted the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Cases Nos 2395 and 2474 (see 353rd Report) concerning excessive delay in processing cases of anti-union discrimination. The Committee had requested the Government to continue providing information on the number of complaints for anti-union discrimination, the average duration of the proceedings and the outcomes of these proceedings.

The Committee notes the statistics of the State Labour Inspectorate provided by the Government on the number of complaints of anti-union discrimination; a total amount of 108 complaints have been received between 1 January 2008 and 6 June 2010 (most of them were considered founded or partially founded). The Committee further notes the Government’s indication that, between 2008 and 2010, there was no conviction under section 35(3) of the Act on Trade Unions providing that “any person, who in connection with his/her position or function held, discriminates against an employee because of his/her membership in the trade union, non-membership in the trade union, or holding a trade union function, shall be liable to a fine or imprisonment”. The Committee expresses its concern about the non-application of the legal sanctions. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure effective application of the legal sanctions for all cases of anti-union discrimination and requests the Government to continue providing information on the number of complaints for anti-union discrimination, as well as on the average duration of the proceedings and their outcomes.

Moreover, the Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to evaluate the results of the Labour Code amendments of 2008 in consultation with the social partners and to indicate any measures taken or contemplated to ensure that trade union officials and members have in practice the right to prompt and effective remedy by the competent national tribunals against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee had also requested the Government to keep it informed of the developments regarding the adoption of the amendments to the Code of Civil Procedure. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that no changes had been made in civil procedure to expedite legal proceedings concerning acts of anti-union discrimination against trade union activists. The Government indicates, however, that one of the means to reduce excessive length of the proceedings is the supervisory action by the Minister of Justice with regard to the activities of presidents of district and appeal courts. The Government also refers to other measures such as the draft Act amending the Law on Common Courts which provides for the periodic assessments of judges' work. The Committee also notes that the Government states that it is worth to consider establishing new measures in the Code of Civil Procedure that would grant the right for trade union activists not to be dismissed until the proceedings in the Labour Court are completed. The Committee welcomes this information and requests the Government to continue providing information on the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that trade union officials and members have in practice the right to prompt and effective protection by the competent national tribunals against acts of anti-union discrimination.

Compensation for anti-union dismissal. The Committee notes that, according to ITUC, victims of anti-union dismissals can ask for reinstatement, but court proceedings can take up to two years; moreover, the courts are increasingly awarding just a three-month salary as compensation in lieu of reinstatement, regardless of how long the activist has been out of work. The Committee notes that the Government confirms that according to section 47 of the Labour Code, the compensation provided for an illegal dismissal of a trade union activist is limited to a maximum equivalent of a three-month salary. The Committee considers that the length of compensation proceedings is excessive and that the amount of compensation in cases of anti-union discrimination is insufficient, and therefore has no dissuasive nature. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the effective implementation of the means of full compensation of dismissed workers because of their trade union affiliation or activities.

Article 4. Collective bargaining rights. The Committee had previously requested the Government to provide information on the 2008 ITUC's comments concerning alleged instances of employers' refusal to negotiate collective agreements or to comply with them. The Committee notes the Government's indication that no instances of employers' refusal to negotiate collective agreements had been reported to the Minister of Labour acting as the registration authority for collective agreements under the national legislation.

Portugal

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1964)

The Committee takes note of the comments from the General Workers' Union (UGT) which were attached to the Government's report and which address compulsory arbitration and trade union representativeness. It also notes the comments of 24 August 2010 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) alleging anti-union practices and restrictions on bargaining rights in the public sector, and those of the Confederation of Portuguese Tourism (CTP) received on 22 September 2010. The Committee asks the Government to send its observations thereon.

Article 4 of the Convention. Compulsory arbitration. In its previous observations the Committee referred to the Labour Code, section 567, which provides that "in disputes arising from the conclusion or revision of a collective labour contract, recourse to arbitration may be compulsory where, after protracted and fruitless negotiations and unsuccessful conciliation and mediation, the parties fail to agree within two months of such procedures to refer the dispute to voluntary arbitration". The Committee also noted that, according to the Government, section 1(b) of Amendment Act No. 9/2006 provides that compulsory arbitration shall be allowed "following a majority vote by the representatives of the workers and the employers in the Standing Committee for Social Partnership" (CPCS) (the Committee took the view that this paragraph should be deleted as in many cases it would allow the decision to impose compulsory arbitration in a dispute to be taken by workers' and employers' organizations that are not party to the dispute).

The Committee notes the adoption of Act No. 7/2009 of 12 February 2009 approving the revision of the Labour Code, and the adoption of Legislative Decree No. 259/2009 of 25 September 2009, which regulates the various instances of compulsory arbitration in a manner generally consistent with the principle of free and voluntary bargaining laid down in the Convention. The Committee notes with satisfaction that with this reform, where protracted and fruitless negotiations have ended in a stalemate deemed impossible to unblock, recourse to compulsory arbitration may be held only for the negotiation of a first collective agreement, in accordance with the principles of the Convention.

However, the Committee notes that section 508(1)(b) of the Labour Code as revised, provides for compulsory arbitration after a majority vote by the representatives of the workers and employers on the CPCS. Consequently, the Committee requests the Government to look into the possibility of amending section 508(1)(b) so as to preclude the decision to impose compulsory arbitration from being taken by workers' and employers' organizations that are not parties to the dispute.

Representativeness of organizations. The Committee noted in previous comments the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2334, which mentioned that the legislation: (1) cites by name the organizations that are to form part of the Economic and Social Council (CES) and the CPCS, which means that some organizations that deem themselves representative are left out; and (2) does not lay down objective criteria for determining the representativeness of workers' and employers' organizations. The Committee had requested the Government, in consultation with the most representative organizations of workers and employers, to work out and lay down objective, precise and predetermined criteria to evaluate the representativeness and independence of employers' and workers' organizations, and to amend the legislation (Act No. 108/91 of the CES, section 9, concerning the CPCS) by deleting the names of the workers' organizations that are to be members of the CES and the CPCS, referring instead to the most representative organizations. The Committee notes the information sent by the Government to the effect that the President of the CES has taken the initiative of launching a general discussion on the composition of the CES with the cooperation of members. It also notes the Government's statement that it is impossible to forecast the outcome of these discussions or the proposals and recommendations the President may make. The Committee hopes that the Standing Committee on Social Partnership will examine these matters in the near future and that the outcome of its discussions will lead to an agreement to amend the legislation along the lines the Committee has been suggesting for years. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard.

Romania

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation's (ITUC) in a communication dated 24 August 2010 and to the comments made by the General Confederation of Industry of Romania (UGIR) in a communication dated 19 August 2010. The Committee further notes the comments made by the National Trade Union Confederation "CNS Cartel Alfa" in a communication dated 6 April 2010, indicating that Law No. 144/2007 (article 41, paragraph (1), point 35) provides that presidents, vice-presidents, secretaries and treasurers of trade union federations and confederations are obliged to publicly declare their wealth and grant the power to state bodies to verify such statements. The Committee finally notes the comments made by the Block of National Trade Unions (BNS) in a communication dated 1 September 2010. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on all these comments.

Draft labour legislation. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that pursuant to an ILO mission, the social partners that are representative at the national level in Romania, as well as representatives of the Romanian Government, signed a memorandum in which they agreed to improve the legal framework on labour and social dialogue. In this regard, the Committee notes that the Government indicates that: (i) the elaboration of Act No. 168/1999 on the settlement of labour conflicts is part of the 2010 legislative schedule; (ii) Act No. 130/1996 on collective agreements and Act No. 54/2003 on trade unions will be debated within the social dialogue commissions from the Ministry of Labour, Family and Social Protection at the latest in December 2010; and (iii) the modification of Act No. 188/199 on the status of civil servants (with its amendments in Law No. 864/2006) was modified by Act No. 140/210 adopted by Parliament on 8 July 2010 but is currently under review.

In this regard, the Committee hopes that in the context of the revision of the abovementioned legislation, due account will be taken of the issues raised in its previous comments which read as follow:

- the need to amend section 62 of Act No. 168/1999 on the settlement of labour disputes (according to which the management of a production unit may submit a dispute to an arbitration commission in the event that a strike has lasted for 20 days without any agreement being reached between the parties and its continuation would affect humanitarian interests) so that compulsory arbitration may only be imposed in essential services in the strict sense of the term and for public servants exercising authority in the name of the State;
- the need for detailed information on the application of sections 55–56 of Act No. 168/1999 on the settlement of labour disputes (according to which the management of a production unit may demand the suspension of a strike, for a maximum period of 30 days, if it endangers the life or health of individuals, and an irrevocable decision may be taken in this respect by the Court of Appeal) and sections 58–60 of the same law (under which the management can request the court to pronounce itself on the illegality of a strike and its ending by issuing an urgent ruling within three days), and to provide copies of decisions handed down under these provisions;
- the need to amend section 66(1) of Act No. 168/1999 on the Settlement of Labour Disputes – which requires that in case of strike in units of public transport one third of the unit's normal activity must be ensured – so as to allow for the minimum services in this sector to be negotiated by the social partners concerned rather than set by the legislation; in the absence of agreement between the parties, minimum services should be determined by an independent body.

The Committee trusts that the Government will be in a position to report progress in the near future on all the issues raised above in the framework of the law reform currently under way, and encourages the Government to continue to avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office if it so wishes.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1958)

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee notes from the International Trade Union Confederation's (ITUC) comments of 24 August 2010, that in recent years, certain employers have made employment conditional upon the worker agreeing not to create or join a union. In this regard, the Committee notes that the Government indicates in its reply dated 19 October 2010 that it does not have any information concerning this issue. The Committee requests the Government to discuss this situation with the most representative organizations of workers and employers and to keep it informed of any developments in this regard.

The Committee also notes that according to ITUC although anti-union activities are prohibited, the sanctions for restricting trade union activities are rarely applied in practice, the procedure for lodging a complaint appears to be too complicated and the authorities do not prioritize the trade unions' complaints. ITUC states that the labour inspectorates do not always respect the confidentiality of the complaints and that certain employers prefer facing penalties rather than complying with the labour laws in place. The Committee finally notes that according to the ITUC, while the law provides for sanctions for obstructing union activities, those sanctions cannot be applied in practice due to loopholes in the Penal Code. The Committee also notes the comments made by the Block of National Trade Unions (BNS) in a communication dated 1 September 2010. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

Moreover, in its previous observation, the Committee had requested the Government to provide statistical information regarding the protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee takes note from the Government's report that the Ministry of Labour, Family and Social Protection does not have statistical data concerning discrimination against trade unions. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report, statistical information, or at least the maximum information available, on the number of cases of anti-union discrimination brought to the competent authorities, the average duration of proceedings and their outcome, as well as information concerning the nature and the outcome of the registered labour disputes that are currently being conciliated before the services of mediation and council of the Ministry of Labour, Family and Social Protection.

Articles 2 and 3. Protection against acts of interference. In its previous comments, the Committee requested information on the penalties against acts of interference which are prohibited under sections 221(2) and 235(3) of Act No. 53/2003 and Act No. 54/2003. The Committee had noted from the Government's report that under Act No. 54/2003, the restriction of the exercise of the activities of trade union officials or the obstruction of the exercise of the right of freedom of association are punished with imprisonment from six months to two years or a fine between 2,000 Romanian new lei (RON) and RON5,000 (approximately US$600–1,600). The Committee considers that these fines might, in some cases, not be sufficiently dissuasive. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to increase the amount of the existing sanctions so that they constitute a sufficient deterrent against all acts of anti-union discrimination.

Articles 4 and 6. Collective bargaining with public servants not engaged in the administration of the State. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted from the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Cases Nos 2611 and 2632 that in the public budget sector which covers all public employees, including those who are not engaged in the administration of the State (e.g. teachers), the following subjects are excluded from the scope of collective bargaining: base salaries, pay increases, allowances, bonuses and other staff entitlements which are fixed by law. The Committee notes from the Government's report that the salary rights in the budget sector were settled by Law No. 330/2009 on Unitary Salaries of the Staff Paid from Public Funds which stipulates that the fixation of salaries is exclusively by law and that it cannot be negotiated.

The Committee recalls that all public servants who are not engaged in the administration of the State should enjoy guarantees provided for in Article 4 of the Convention with regard to the promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee further recalls that if, as part of its stabilization policy, a government considers that wage rates cannot be settled freely through collective bargaining, such a restriction should be imposed as an exceptional measure and only to the extent that is necessary, without exceeding a reasonable period, and it should be accompanied by adequate safeguards to protect workers' living standards. Therefore, the Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report if Law No. 330/2009 on Unitary Salaries of the Staff Paid from Public Funds is considered as an exceptional measure within the context of an economic stabilization policy, if adequate safeguards were established in order to protect workers' living standards and if it provides for a limited length of application.

Draft labour legislations. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that pursuant to the ILO mission, the social partners that are representative at the national level, as well as representatives of the Government, signed a memorandum in which they agreed to improve the legal framework on labour and social dialogue and in this regard, the Committee notes that the Government indicates that: (i) the elaboration of Act No. 168/1999 on the settlement of labour conflicts is part of the 2010 legislative schedule; (ii) Act No. 130/1996 on collective agreements and Act 54/2003 on trade unions will be debated within the Social Dialogue Commissions from the Ministry of Labour, Family and Social Protection at the latest in December 2010; and (iii) the modification of Act No. 188/1999 on the status of civil servants (with its amendments in Law No. 864/2006) was modified by Act No. 140/2010 adopted by the Parliament on 8 July 2010, but is currently under review.

The Committee has not yet received any update concerning the possible amendments of these legislative texts. It trusts that the Government will be in a position to report progress soon on the issues raised above in the framework of the law reform currently underway and transmit a copy of the relevant legislation once adopted. The Committee encourages the Government to continue to avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office if it so wishes.

Russian Federation

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 24 August 2010 alleging numerous violations of trade union rights in practice, including denial of registration of trade unions, interference by the authorities in internal trade union affairs, harassment of trade union leaders, and restrictions on the rights to strike. The Committee recalls that in its previous observations it had also noted communications submitted by the ITUC containing similar allegations. The Committee further notes the comments submitted by the Russian Labour Confederation and the Seafarers' Union of Russia in a communication dated 16 December 2009. The Committee notes with regret that the Government once again did not provide observations on the comments submitted by the ITUC or other workers' organizations. The Committee strongly urges the Government to provide its observations thereon, as well as on the previous comments of the ITUC.

Article 3 of the Convention. Right of workers' and employers' organizations to organize their administration and activities. Right to strike. Labour Code. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to amend section 412 of the Labour Code, so as to ensure that any disagreement concerning minimum services in organizations responsible for safety, health and life of people and vital interests of society, where the minimum services must be ensured during a strike, is settled not by the executive body but by an independent body having the confidence of all parties to the dispute. The Committee notes that while the Government confirms that a body of executive power of the Russian Federation is entitled to define minimum services, it indicates that such a decision may be appealed by the parties to the collective labour dispute to the court. The Committee considers that since the system of minimum services restricts one of the essential means of pressure available to workers to defend their economic and social interests, their organizations should be able, if they so wish, to participate in defining such a service, along with employers and the public authorities. It would be highly desirable for negotiations on the definition and organization of the minimum service not to be held during a labour dispute, so that all parties can examine the matter with the necessary objectivity and detachment. The parties might also envisage the establishment of a joint or independent body responsible for examining rapidly and without formalities the difficulties raised by the definition and application of such a minimum service, and empowered to issue enforceable decisions (see General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, 1994, paragraph 161). The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to amend section 412 of the Labour Code so as to ensure that any disagreement concerning minimum services is settled not by the executive body but by an independent body having the confidence of all the parties to the dispute.

The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to amend section 413 of the Labour Code so as to ensure that when a strike is prohibited, any disagreement concerning a collective dispute is settled by an independent body and not by the Government. The Committee takes due note of the Government's explanation that it is entitled to stop a strike in services of a vital interest until the issue is solved by the court under this section, but this injunction may not last longer than ten days.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Ministry of Health and Social Development together with the social partners are elaborating the Concept of the Social Partnership Development and that within the framework of this exercise, it is envisaged to address the issues related to the provisions of the Labour Code and other rules and regulations regarding the organization and conduct of strikes, to establish an efficient mechanism for solving labour collective disputes and to improve the labour legislation taking into account the comments of the ILO supervisory bodies. The Government further indicates that the permanent tripartite working group of the State Duma Committee on Labour and Social Policy has resumed its work with a view to study the legal practice and prepare proposals aimed at improving labour legislation. This working group intends to consider proposals of the social partners on the Labour Code amendments. In this respect, the Committee notes the comments submitted by the Russian Labour Confederation and the Seafarers' Union of Russia alleging that the work on amending the Labour Code pursuant to the recommendations of the ILO supervisory bodies was not moving forward. The Committee hopes that the work of the abovementioned working group will result in the near future in a legislative reform that will take into account the abovementioned comments and requests the Government to provide information on any further developments in this respect. The Committee once again reminds the Government that it can avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office if it so wishes.

Other legislation. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to ensure that workers of postal services, municipal services and railways can exercise the right to strike and, to that effect, amend section 9 of the 1994 Federal Postal Service Act, section 11(1(10)) of the 1998 Federal Municipal Services Act and section 26 of the 2003 Federal Rail Transport Act. It further requested the Government to indicate whether there are any legislative restrictions imposed on the right to strike of civil servants other than civil servants exercising authority in the name of the State. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the right to strike of the following categories of workers is restricted: workers of the federal courier communications and the municipal employees, as well as certain categories of railway workers. The Government further indicates that the Law on State Civil Service of the Russian Federation of 2004 prohibits civil servants from stopping their duties to solve a labour dispute. The Committee notes that the Government considers that the restrictions imposed on the right to strike of certain categories of workers do not contradict international standards and indicates that workers whose right to strike is restricted have the possibility of using other means of solving collective labour disputes, such as mediation procedure or applying to the Government. The Government refers, in particular, to Article 8(2) and (3) of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and points out that under these provisions, a State may impose prohibition on the exercise of the right to strike by members of the armed forces, of the police, or of the administration of the State, but that nothing in this Article shall authorize States parties to Convention No. 87 to take legislative measures which would prejudice, or apply the law in such a manner as would prejudice, the guarantees provided for in that Convention. The Committee recalls its basic position that the right to strike is an intrinsic corollary of the right to organize protected by Convention No. 87. It further recalls that in addition to the armed forces and the police (members of which could be excluded from the application of the Convention), the right to strike may be restricted or prohibited only for public servants exercising authority in the name of the State and in essential services in the strict sense of the term, i.e. services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population. The Committee considers that railway services and postal services do not constitute essential services. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to amend the abovementioned legislative acts so as to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention and ensure that workers of the federal courier communications, railway workers, municipal employees, as well as public servants who do not exercise authority in the name of the State, can exercise the right to strike. It requests the Government to indicate in its next report all measures taken in this respect.

The Committee had previously requested the Government to specify the categories of workers employed in the internal affairs agencies who are prohibited from striking. The Committee takes due note of the Government's indication that members of the police, holding the rank and file or command posts, are prohibited from stopping their duties in order to solve a labour dispute.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 24 August 2010 alleging numerous violations of trade union rights in practice, including acts of anti-union discrimination and interference by employers in trade union internal affairs, as well as ineffective mechanisms of protection against such violations. The Committee recalls that in its previous observations it had also noted communications submitted by the ITUC containing similar allegations. The Committee further notes the comments submitted by the Russian Labour Confederation and the Seafarers' Union of Russia in a communication dated 16 December 2009 alleging that the work on amending the Labour Code pursuant to the recommendations of the ILO supervisory bodies was not moving forward. The Committee notes with regret that the Government once again does not provide observations on the comments submitted by ITUC and other workers' organizations and expects that the Government will provide its observations on the 2006, 2008 and 2010 comments of ITUC with its next report.

Articles 1–3 of the Convention. The Committee had previously requested the Government to specify concrete sanctions imposed on employers found guilty of anti-union discrimination, as well as sanctions imposed for acts of interference by workers' or employers' organizations or their agents in each other's affairs, particularly in the establishing, functioning and administration of the organizations, and to indicate the relevant legislative provisions. The Committee notes that in its report, the Government refers to the provisions of the Labour Code (section 195), Criminal Code (sections 201 and 285) and Code of Administrative Offences (sections 5.28–5.34). In particular, it indicates that section 195 of the Labour Code provides for a possibility of bringing the head of an organization/undertaking and his or her deputies to the disciplinary liability, including dismissal, for violation of labour legislation and trade union rights. The Committee notes that this section imposes an obligation on an employer to consider an application by an employees' representative body alleging violations of labour laws, other normative legal acts and terms of a collective agreement by the head of an organization/undertaking and/or his or her deputies and, if such violations are confirmed, to impose a disciplinary penalty, including dismissal, on the person responsible. The Committee further notes sections 201 and 285 of the Criminal Code, both punishing abuse of power, concern crimes against the interests of services in profit-making and other organizations, and crimes against State power and interests of the civil service and the service in local self-governing bodies, respectively, and provide for heavy sanctions, including fines and imprisonment. Finally, the Committee notes sections 5.28–5.34 of the Code of Administrative Offences, providing for punishment in the form of a fine from five to 50 minimum wages for violation of labour laws, generally, and for: (1) avoidance of participation in collective bargaining; (2) refusal to provide information; (3) unreasonable refusal to conclude a collective agreement; (4) violations of collective agreement; (5) avoidance of receiving employees' demands and participating in conciliatory procedures; and (6) dismissal of employees in connection with a collective labour dispute or a strike, in particular. The Government indicates that cases related to administrative offences are considered by the officials of the Federal Service on Labour and Employment and the bodies of the Federal Labour Inspection subordinated to it (section 23.12 of the Code). It further indicates that according to section 353 of the Labour Code, the Federal Labour Inspection ensures the supervision and control over the compliance with the labour legislation and other rules and regulations containing labour law provisions by all employers in the territory. While noting this information, the Committee refers to the allegations of ineffective mechanisms of protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference by employers in trade union internal affairs, as well as numerous violations of this nature in practice submitted by ITUC. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the application of the abovementioned legislative provisions in practice and, in particular, on the number of complaints of anti-union discrimination and acts of interference submitted, investigated and prosecuted within the last two years, as well as on the number of persons punished and the concrete sanctions imposed.

Article 4. Parties to collective bargaining. The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend section 31 of the Labour Code so as to ensure that it is clear that it is only in the event where there are no trade unions at the workplace that an authorization to bargain collectively can be conferred to other representative bodies. The Committee notes the Government's indication that this issue will be discussed with the social partners at the October 2010 conference on the improvement of labour legislation. The Committee expresses the hope that section 31 of the Code will be soon amended and requests the Government to provide a copy of the amended text once it has been adopted.

Compulsory arbitration. The Committee notes the Government's indication that with the adoption of amendments to the Labour Code in 2006, the Law on collective labour disputes is no longer in force. The Committee further notes the Government's explanation that pursuant to sections 402–404 of the Labour Code, labour arbitration can only be established by the consent of the parties to the dispute, who also elect the arbitrators. The Government points out that it is impossible to establish an arbitration board at the will of only one of the parties to the dispute, except in cases provided for by Part 7 of section 404 of the Labour Code. The Committee notes that this provision refers to section 413, Parts 1 and 2, of the Labour Code and thereby imposes compulsory arbitration not only in essential services in the strict sense of the term, but also in other services determined by federal laws. The Committee recalls that recourse to compulsory arbitration in cases where the parties do not reach an agreement is generally permissible only in the context of essential services in the strict sense of the term or in the case of civil servants exercising authority in the name of the State. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the relevant sections of the Labour Code so as to ensure the application of the abovementioned principle and to indicate measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

Level of collective bargaining. With regard to the Committee's previous request to ensure that the legislation provides for a possibility to conclude an agreement at the occupational or professional level, the Committee notes the Government's indication that section 45 of the Labour Code provides that agreements may be concluded at the general, interregional, regional, industrial, inter-industrial, territorial and other levels. The Government further explains that the legislation does not contain any provision prohibiting a possibility of concluding agreements at the occupational level and that while their number is small, there have been agreements signed at the occupational level. Furthermore, the Government indicates that the federal bodies of the executive power had not received any complaint regarding the lack of possibility to conclude agreements at the occupational or professional levels. The Committee takes due note of this information.

The Committee notes examples of collective agreements applicable to civil servants and civil employees of the military service and the system of execution of penal sentences provided by the Government.

With regard to its previous comments on the Labour Code amendment, the Committee refers to its observation on the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), where it noted the information provided by the Government and, in particular its indication that the permanent tripartite working group of the State Duma Committee on Labour and Social Policy has resumed its work with a view to prepare proposals aimed at improving labour legislation, while taking into consideration proposals of the social partners. The Committee hopes that the work of the abovementioned working group will result in the near future in a legislative reform that will take into account the comments above and requests the Government to provide information on any further developments in this respect. The Committee once again reminds the Government that it can avail itself of the technical cooperation of the Office if it so wishes.

Rwanda

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1988)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish organizations of their own choosing. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that: (1) articles 11, 33, 35, 36, 38 and 39 of the Constitution of 4 June 2003 guarantee freedom of expression and association for state employees, as for all other citizens; (2) Law No. 22/2002 of 9 July 2002, on the General Statute for the Rwanda public service, is silent on the right of public servants to organize and to collective bargaining, although section 73 of the Law provides that public servants and the staff of public enterprises enjoy rights and freedoms on the same basis as other citizens; (3) the procedures for the implementation of section 73 of Law No. 22/2002 are still to be determined, and the scope of the relevant provisions of the Labour Code respecting occupational organizations need to be extended to state officials; and (4) although the Government indicated that there are unions of public servants in Rwanda, the legal void as regards the right to organize of this category of workers could give rise to problems in practice. The Committee had noted that, under the terms of section 3 of the new Labour Code, “every person employed under the general statutes for the Rwanda public service or every person under specific statutes shall not be subject to the provisions of this law, except for matters that may be provided for by Prime Minister’s orders”. It further noted that, according to the Government’s report, the process is under way of revising the General Statute governing public civil servants. The Committee recalls that public servants shall enjoy the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing to further and defend their interests. The Committee trusts that the revision of the General Statute governing public civil servants will be completed in the near future and that it will take duly into account the above principle so as to ensure that public servants enjoy the guarantees laid down in the Convention. It requests the Government to provide a copy of the Law once it has been adopted.

Article 3. Right of organizations to organize their administration and activities and to formulate their programmes in full freedom. The Committee had noted that section 155(2) of the new Labour Code refers to an order of the Minister responsible for labour to determine “indispensable services” and the conditions of exercising the right to strike in these services. In its report, the Government had indicated that the order is prepared following consultations with the National Labour Council and that the text is still at the draft stage. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the order once it has been adopted.

The Committee had noted that, under the terms of section 124 of the Labour Code, any organization requesting recognition as the most representative organization has to authorize the labour administration to check the register of its members and property. In this respect, the Committee recalls that the control exercised by the public authorities over trade union finances should not go beyond the requirement for the organizations to submit periodic reports. The Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary measures to amend section 124 of the Labour Code taking into account the above principle.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Finally, the Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 24 August 2010. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1988)

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. In its previous comments the Committee asked the Government to take steps to establish sufficiently dissuasive penalties for acts of anti-union interference and discrimination. The Committee noted that, according to the provisions of section 114 of the new Labour Code, any act which infringes the provisions providing protection against acts of discrimination and interference shall constitute an offence and incur the payment of damages. The Committee noted that the amount of damages has not been fixed, except for wrongful termination of an unemployment contract, as laid down by section 33 of the Code. In the latter case, the damages vary from three to six months’ wages, and may amount to as much as nine months’ pay where the worker has more than ten years’ service with the same employer, or where staff delegates or union representatives are concerned. The Committee requests the Government to provide further information on the amount of damages applicable for acts of discrimination against trade union members or officials, other than the dismissal of trade union representatives.

Article 4. With reference to its previous comments concerning compulsory arbitration in the context of collective bargaining, the Committee noted with regret that the collective dispute settlement procedure provided for in section 143 ff. of the new Code culminates, in cases of non-conciliation, in referral to an arbitration committee whose decisions may be the subject of an appeal to the competent jurisdiction, whose decision shall be binding. The Committee recalls that, except for the cases of public servants engaged in the administration of the State and essential services in the strict sense of the term, arbitration imposed by the authorities or at the request of one party is generally contrary to the principle of the voluntary negotiation of collective agreements established by the Convention, and thus the autonomy of bargaining partners (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 257). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the legislation in such a way that, except in the circumstances referred to above, a collective labour dispute in the context of collective bargaining may be submitted to the competent legal authority only with the agreement of both parties.

Moreover, with reference to its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 121 of the Code provides that, at the request of a representative organization of workers or employers, the collective agreement shall be negotiated within a joint committee convened by the Minister of Labour or his delegate or the competent labour inspector. The Committee recalls that such a provision may well restrict the principle of free and voluntary negotiation of the parties within the meaning of the Convention, and even of being applied where one party wishes to have a new collective agreement even before the existing agreement has expired. The Committee requests the Government to take steps to amend section 121 of the Labour Code so that recourse to a joint committee for negotiating a collective agreement is possible only with the agreement of both parties.

With regard to the question of the extension of collective agreements, the Committee noted that, under section 133 of the Labour Code, at the request of a representative workers’ or employers’ organization, whether or not it is a party to the agreement or on its own initiative, the Minister of Labour may make all or some of the provisions of a collective agreement binding on all employers and workers covered by the occupational and territorial scope of the agreement. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the legislation so that the extension of collective agreements is the subject of in-depth tripartite consultations (even where provision is made, as is the case in section 136 of the Code, for the parties affected by the application of an extended collective agreement to file a request for an exemption with the Minister of Labour).

Article 6. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee noted that, under section 3 of the Code, any person governed by the general or individual public service regulations is not subject to the provisions of the Code other than for matters determined by an Order of the Prime Minister. The Committee regrets that the national authorities have not taken the opportunity afforded by the reform of the Labour Code to guarantee the right to collective bargaining for public servants covered by the Convention and requests the Government to indicate any measures taken or contemplated to this end.

Finally, the Committee requests the Government to supply information in its next report on the activities of the National Labour Council with regard to collective bargaining, on the number of collective agreements concluded, and on the sectors and numbers of workers covered.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 24 August 2010. It requests the Government to send its observations on this matter.

Saint Kitts and Nevis

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 2000)

Article 1 of the Convention. Adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination in respect of employment. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that section 11 of the Protection of Employment Act refers to protection against termination of employment on the grounds of union membership or participation in union activities. The Committee had recalled that, under the Convention, workers should enjoy adequate protection against any measures of anti-union discrimination both at the time of employment and throughout the course of employment, including up to the time of work termination (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraphs 203 and 210). Noting the Government's indication that the Committee's recommendation will be submitted to the competent authority, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary legislative measures so as to ensure that workers are granted adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination at the time of employment, and throughout the course of employment up to termination and to provide information on any development in this regard.

Sufficiently dissuasive sanctions. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that, according to section 44(2) of the Protection of Employment Act, any employer who fails to comply with any of the provisions of this Act (including section 11 which prohibits anti-union dismissals) shall be guilty of an offence and on summary conviction shall be liable to a fine not exceeding 2,000 East Caribbean dollars (equivalent to US$745). The Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to increase the amount of the existing sanctions so that they constitute a sufficient deterrent against all acts of anti-union discrimination. Noting the Government's indication that the Department of Labour held discussions with the Minister of Labour and a legal consultant to provide assistance on labour matters in an effort to ensure that the existing sanctions outlined in the Act be increased according to the Committee's recommendation, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on any development in this regard.

Article 2. Adequate protection against acts of interference. In its previous comments, the Committee had recalled that legislation should make express provision for rapid appeal procedures, coupled with effective and dissuasive sanctions against acts of interference in order to ensure the application in practice of Article 2 of the Convention; moreover, to ensure that these measures receive the necessary publicity and are effective in practice, the relevant legislation should explicitly lay down these substantive provisions, as well as appeals and sanctions in order to guarantee their application (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 232). The Committee had requested the Government to adopt specific measures, coupled with effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions, against acts of interference. Noting that consideration will be given by the Government to adopt specific measures according to its recommendation, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on any development in this regard.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that the laws referred to by the Government did not contain any provision concerning the right to bargain collectively. The Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to explicitly recognize in legislation and to regulate the right of collective bargaining in conformity with the principles of the Convention. Noting that consideration will be given by the Government to adopt specific measures according to its recommendation, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on any development in this regard.

Saint Lucia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1980)

The Committee notes that the Government did not provide any information concerning its previous comments in its report. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers without distinction whatsoever, to establish and to join organizations of their own choosing and without previous authorization. Requirements for the establishment of an organization. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that in a draft Labour Code the minimum founding membership for a trade union and for an employers' organization had been reduced from 30 to 20 and from ten to six, respectively. It had requested the Government to keep it informed of new developments concerning the draft and to submit a copy of the Code. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the draft Labour Code had passed into law but has been placed on hold by the new Government and that it is currently with the Attorney-General. The Committee again hopes that the new legislation will soon be applicable and requests the Government to submit a copy of the legislation with its next report.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Sao Tome and Principe

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1992)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 3 of the Convention. Right of organizations to organize their activities and formulate their programmes. The Committee recalls that it has been commenting for a number of years on the need for the Government to take steps to amend the provisions of Act No. 4/92, which refer to the following issues:

- the majority required for calling a strike is too high (section 4 of Act No. 4/92);
- with regard to minimum services, it is important, in the event of disagreement in determining such services, that the matter be settled by an independent body and not by the employer (section 10(4) of Act No. 4/92);
- the hiring of workers without consultation with the trade unions concerned to perform services essential to maintain the economic and financial viability of the enterprise should it be seriously threatened by a strike (section 9 of Act No. 4/92); and
- compulsory arbitration for services which are not essential in the strict sense (services whose interruption might endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population) (postal, banking and loan services; section 11 of Act No. 4/92).

The Committee asks the Government to take steps to amend the abovementioned legislative provisions so as to bring the legislation into line with the Convention and to indicate, in its next report, any measures adopted in this respect. The Committee also asks the Government to indicate whether federations and confederations are able to exercise the right to strike.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Finally, noting that Law No. 4-2002 of 30 December 2002 allows requisition of workers in cases of strikes in non-essential services, the Committee requests the Government to take measures to modify the legislation so as to guarantee that the requisition of workers is only possible in the essential services in the strict sense of the terms.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1992)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. Nevertheless, it notes the information supplied in connection with the application of the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154).

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. In its previous comment the Committee asked the Government to indicate what sanctions may be imposed against acts of discrimination that undermine freedom of association and acts of interference by employers and their organizations in workers' organizations and vice versa. The Committee noted the Government's indication that there is no legislation that lays down penalties for acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee therefore requests the Government once again to take the necessary steps to adopt appropriate legislation which imposes sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions against acts of anti-union discrimination and acts of interference committed by employers against trade union organizations, in conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether specific legal protection exists for trade union members should they be subjected to acts of anti-union discrimination on the basis of their participation in legitimate trade union activities.

Article 4. The Committee notes the Government's statement concerning the adoption of a new Constitution, a copy of which will be sent to the Office. The Committee observes that the right to collective bargaining is recognized in Act No. 5/92 of 28 May 1992 concerning trade unions but is not itself governed by legislation. The Committee also notes the Government's statement that collective bargaining does not apply to the public service. The Committee notes the Government's indication in various reports on the bill concerning the legal framework of collective bargaining that this bill has still not been adopted. In these circumstances, the Committee reiterates the importance of the bill being adopted as soon as possible and of the right to collective negotiation of their conditions of work and employment being secured to all workers in the public and private sectors, including public servants. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the progress of the legislative procedures relating to the adoption of the bill and to take all possible steps to ensure its adoption in the very near future, in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers.

Application in practice. Finally, the Committee notes the Government's statement that no collective agreements currently exist in the country owing to geographical factors. The Committee requests the Government to avail itself of technical assistance from the ILO to resolve this major issue.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that the Labour Directorate of the Ministry of Labour might act as an intermediary between the parties to collective bargaining, including in order to ensure the effectiveness of the agreement. The Committee requests the Government to provide further information on the role of the Labour Directorate in the collective bargaining process.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

In its previous observation, the Committee noted the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in August 2008, by the National Confederation of Workers of Senegal (CNTS) in September 2008 and the Free Workers Union of Senegal (UTLS) in September 2007. The Committee notes the comments dated 24 August 2010 made by the ITUC on the application of the Convention and in particular on discriminatory practices in the recognition of trade unions, as well as on dismissals and suspensions of strikers. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that unions can be established freely, that they are recognized by the authorities and that therefore there could be no discriminatory practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide without delay its observations on the comments made by the ITUC on dismissals and suspensions of strikers, as well as on the comments of the ITUC, the CNTS and the UTLS referring to the intervention by the security forces during duly authorized protest marches and discriminatory practices in the recognition of unions.

Bringing national legislation into conformity with the Convention. In general, the Committee notes from the Government's report that following a study on the compliance of the national legislation with the ILO fundamental Conventions, carried out with the assistance of the Office, measures are being taken to amend the legislation, including the Labour Code, with a view to ensuring full compliance with the Convention. The Committee welcomes the initiative and expects that the Government will provide in its next report all relevant information on the measures taken to amend its legislation taking into account the following points.

Article 2 of the Convention. Trade union rights of minors. The Committee expects that the Government will take all necessary measures to guarantee the right to organize of minors who have access to the labour market (persons of 15 years of age, according to section L.145 of the Labour Code) both as workers and as apprentices, without parental authorization being necessary.

Articles 2, 5 and 6. Right of workers to establish organizations of their own choosing without previous authorization. The Committee recalls that for many years it has been commenting on the need to repeal Act No. 76-28 of 6 April 1976 and to amend section L.8 of the Labour Code (as amended in 1997) so as to guarantee to workers and their organizations the right to establish organizations of their own choosing without previous authorization. The Committee expects that the Government will take without delay the necessary measures in order to repeal the legislative provisions that restrain workers' freedom to form their own organizations, especially provisions directed at the morality and capacity of workers' representatives, or that granting to the authorities a discretionary power of prior approval, which is contrary to the Convention.

Article 3. Requisitioning. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Decree implementing section L.276 has not yet been adopted and that Decree No. 72-017 of 11 January 1972 determining the list of posts, jobs and functions in which the occupants may be requisitioned continues to be applied under section L.288 of the Labour Code. The Government indicates that it is considering adopting legislative texts implementing the Labour Code and, in particular, section L.276. The Committee expects that the Government will take without delay the necessary measures to adopt the Decree implementing section L.276 of the Labour Code and to establish a list of posts, jobs and functions authorizing requisitioning of workers only with a view to ensuring the operation of essential services in the strict sense of the term.

Occupation of workplaces during a strike. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, under the terms of section L.276 in fine, workplaces or their immediate surroundings may not be occupied during a strike under penalty of sanctions established in sections L.275 and L.279. *Noting the Government's indication that it will consider the Committee's proposal in the framework of the Labour Code reform, the Committee expects that the Government will take the necessary measures in order to include a provision which would ensure that the restrictions set forth in section L.276 in fine, apply only when strikes cease to be peaceful or when respect for freedom to work of non-strikers and the right of the management to enter the premises of the enterprise are hindered.*

Article 4. Dissolution by administrative authority. The Committee notes the Government's indication that it is committed to taking the relevant measures in order to amend its legislation with a view to including an explicit provision establishing that the dissolution of seditious associations, as envisaged by Act No. 65-40, may in no event be applied to occupational trade union organizations. The Committee expects that the Government will indicate all measures taken in this respect.

Serbia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the Confederation of Autonomous Trade Unions of Serbia (CATUS) received on 15 November 2010 and by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 24 August 2010. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon in its next report.

In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to provide its observations on the comments made by the ITUC and the CATUS concerning alleged physical assaults against union officials and members, especially in the educational and health-care sectors. The Committee takes note that the Government indicates, in its report, that it has no knowledge of physical attacks on trade union officials or members in these sectors.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of employers to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. The Committee recalls that for a number of years, it has been commenting upon the need to amend section 216 of the Labour Act which provides that employers' associations may be established by employers that employ no less than 5 per cent of the total number of employees in a certain branch, group, subgroup, line of business or territory of a certain territorial unit, in order to establish a reasonable minimum membership requirement. In its previous observation, the Committee had noted the Government's indication that the Committee's comments on section 216 will be taken into consideration in the course of amendment of the Labour Act. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the work on amendments and addendums to the Labour Act is under way and that the completion of the work is planned for the end of 2010. The Committee hopes that in the process of revising the legislation, due account will be taken of its comments concerning the amendment of section 216 of the Labour Code and requests the Government to provide a copy of the amendments and addendums to the Labour Act as soon as adopted.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on 24 August 2010 and the Government's reply thereon. The Committee further notes the comments made by the Confederation of Autonomous Trade Unions of Serbia (CATUS) received on 15 November 2010. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon in its next report.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union discrimination in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that, according to the ITUC and the CATUS, although the Labour Law of 2005 prohibits discrimination on the basis of trade union membership, it does not expressly prohibit discrimination for trade union activities and establishes no specific sanctions for anti-union harassment and, moreover, the right to organize is not protected in practice. The Committee had requested the Government to provide information on the application of the Convention in practice, including through statistical data on the number of complaints of anti-union discrimination brought to the competent authorities (labour inspectorate and judicial bodies), the outcome of any investigations and judicial proceedings and their average duration. The Committee notes that, while the Government recalls in its report that specific and dissuasive sanctions against anti-union discrimination are provided in sections 13, 18–21, 273 and 274 of the Labour Law, it does not provide the information previously requested by the Committee. In these circumstances, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information, in its next report, on the application of the Convention in practice, including through statistical data on the number of complaints of anti-union discrimination brought to the competent authorities (labour inspectorate and judicial bodies) as well as on the outcome of investigations and judicial proceedings and their average duration.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that, according to section 263 of the Labour Law, "[c]ollective agreements shall be concluded for a three-year term". The Committee had recalled that the parties should be in a position to shorten this duration by mutual agreement, if they consider it appropriate. The Committee had requested the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated to amend section 263 of the Labour Law in accordance with the above. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that: (i) section 264 of the Labour Law provides that the validity of a collective agreement may cease prior to the expiry of a three-year period, by mutual agreement of all parties, or by termination, in the manner stipulated by law; and (ii) in case of termination, collective agreements shall be applied for a maximum of six months after the termination and the parties are bound to commence the bargaining process within 15 days after the termination, at the latest.

In its previous comments, the Committee had raised the need to amend section 233 of the Labour Law – which imposes a time period of three years before an organization which previously failed to obtain recognition as most representative, or a new organization, may seek a new decision on the issue of representativeness. The Committee had emphasized the need to ensure that a new request may be made after a reasonable period has elapsed, sufficiently in advance of the expiration of the applicable collective agreement. The Committee had recalled that the Serbian Association of Employers (SAE) had criticized this provision in its communication of 7 April 2005 as imposing an excessively long period of time. The Committee had noted the Government's indication that this provision is aimed at protecting unions and employers' associations whose representativeness has been established by providing that their status may not be reviewed prior to the expiry of a three-year term. Moreover, according to the Government, this provision does not prevent trade unions and employers' organizations, that had previously failed to establish their representativeness, from asking for a new decision on this issue at any moment, without having to wait for three years. The Committee notes the Government's indication that amendments and addendums to the Labour Law are under way, which will address, inter alia, the conditions and procedures for the establishment and reconsideration of trade unions' and employers' associations' representativeness. In these circumstances, the Committee hopes that due account will be taken of its comments concerning the amendment of section 233 of the Labour Law, in a manner which will reduce the three-year time span to a more reasonable period or allow explicitly the procedures for the determination of most representative status to take place in advance of the expiration of the applicable collective agreement and requests the Government to indicate any development in this regard in its next report.

Representativeness of workers' and employers' organizations. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the comments made by the CATUS, according to which there is a lack of a mechanism for the identification of the number of members of representative workers' and employers' organizations, as well as for the verification of such data at the enterprise level. The Committee had noted that, according to section 227(4) and (5) of the Labour Law, "[t]he total number of employees and employers on a territory of a certain territorial unit, in a branch, group, subgroup or a line of business shall be determined on the basis of information supplied by the competent statistical body, or other body keeping the pertinent records" and "[t]he total number of employees with an employer shall be determined according to the certificate issued by the employer". The bodies in charge of assessing representativeness are the employer, in the first place, and the tripartite panel for establishing representativeness, in the second place. The Committee had requested the Government to provide additional information on the mechanism for assessing representativeness of trade unions and employers' organizations. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the conditions and mechanism for the establishment of the representativeness of trade unions and employers' organizations: (a) are decided by the Minister of Labour upon a proposal by a specific tripartite committee; and (b) will be subject to amendments in the process of the current revision of the Labour Law, in consultation with the social partners. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any developments in this regard as well as a copy of the amended Labour Law once adopted.

The Committee recalls that, in its previous observations, it had requested the Government to lift the 10 per cent requirement for employers' organizations to be able to engage in collective bargaining which is particularly high, especially in the context of negotiations in large enterprises, at the sector or national level. The Committee notes that section 222 of the Labour Law still requires employers' associations to represent 10 per cent of the total number of employers and employ 15 per cent of the total number of employees in order to exercise collective bargaining rights. The Committee had noted that, according to the Government, the issue will be reconsidered in the framework of the revision of the Labour Law, with the participation of the representative workers' and employers' organizations. The Committee notes that the amendments to the Labour Law that are currently under way also address the representativeness of trade unions and employers' organizations. In these circumstances, the Committee hopes that due account will be taken of its comments concerning the amendment of section 222 of the Labour Law so as to lower the percentage requirements which must be fulfilled by employers' organizations in order to engage in collective bargaining and requests the Government to indicate any development in this regard in its next report.

The Committee expresses the hope that the Government will take the necessary measures without delay in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the requirements of the Convention and requests the Government to indicate the progress made in this respect.

Seychelles

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee recalls that for several years it has been commenting upon several provisions of the Industrial Relations Act (IRA) concerning the issues of trade union registration and the exercise of the right to strike. The Committee notes that, according to the information provided in the Government's report, while a review of the IRA is high on the list, it will only be undertaken after the revision of the Employment Act, currently under review. The Government indicates that once the committee responsible to review the IRA is set up, the Committee's observations will be brought to its attention for further action. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to amend the following sections of the IRA:

- section 9(1)(b) and (f), which confers to the registrar discretionary power to refuse registration;
- section 52(1)(a)(iv), which provides that a strike has to be approved by two-thirds of union members present and voting at the meeting called for the purpose of considering the issue;

- section 52(4), which allows the minister to declare a strike to be unlawful if he is of the opinion that its continuance would endanger, amongst other things, “public order or the national economy”;
- section 52(1)(b), which provides for a cooling-off period of 60 days before a strike may begin; and
- section 56(1), which imposes penalties of up to six months of imprisonment for organizing or participating in a strike declared unlawful on the basis of the IRA provisions.

The Committee expresses the hope that the Industrial Relations Act will soon be amended, taking into account previous comments by the Committee and requests the Government to indicate any progress in this respect.

In its previous observation, the Committee had noted the Government’s desire to avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office in this process. The Committee trusts that the necessary technical assistance of the Office, requested by the Government, will be provided in the near future.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1999)

Articles 2, 3 and 4 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that for several years it has been commenting upon several provisions of the Industrial Relations Act (IRA) concerning insufficient protection against acts of interference and restrictions on the right to bargain collectively. The Committee notes that, according to the information provided in the Government’s report, while a review of the IRA is highly envisaged, it will only be undertaken after the revision of the Employment Act, currently under review. The Government indicates that once the committee responsible to review the IRA is set up, the Committee’s observations will be brought to its attention for further action. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to:

- adopt legislative provisions providing for protection against acts of interference by employers or their organizations into workers’ organizations, in particular, acts which are designed to promote the establishment of workers’ organizations under the domination or control by employers or employers’ organizations, coupled with effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions; and
- to amend its legislation so as to ensure that recourse to compulsory arbitration in cases where the parties do not reach an agreement through collective bargaining is permissible only in the context of essential services, in the strict sense of the term, and for civil servants engaged in the administration of the State.

The Committee expresses the hope that the Industrial Relations Act will soon be amended, taking into account previous comments by the Committee and requests the Government to indicate any progress in this respect.

Article 6. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it had requested the Government to take the necessary measures so as to ensure that prison staff, excluded from the scope of the IRA are granted the right to bargain collectively. The Committee notes that no information has been provided by the Government in this respect. It therefore reiterates its previous request and once again asks the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

In its previous observation, the Committee had noted the Government’s wish to avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office with regard to the amendment of the IRA. The Committee trusts that the necessary technical assistance of the Office, requested by the Government, will be provided in the near future.

Sierra Leone

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes with regret that for several years the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Need to adopt specific provisions accompanied by sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions for the protection of workers and workers’ organizations against acts of anti-union discrimination and acts of interference. The Committee had previously noted that the revision of the labour laws, prepared with ILO technical assistance, had already been submitted to tripartite meetings, that the comments of the tripartite body had been received and that the document had just been forwarded to the Law Officers’ Department. The Committee had asked the Government to keep it informed of any further progress made in the preparation of the final draft document and to provide a copy of the revised legislation as soon as it had been adopted. Noting that, according to the information previously sent by the Government, the revision of the labour laws was submitted to the Law Officers’ Department in 1995, the Committee requests the Government once again to make every effort to take the necessary action for the adoption of the new legislation in the very near future and to indicate the progress made in this regard.

Article 4. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the collective agreements in force in the education sector and in other sectors.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

The Committee notes that, since 1992 when a draft Industrial Relations Act was under discussion, the Government only provided a report in 2004. The Committee therefore requests the Government to furnish a detailed report on the application of the Convention, accompanied by copies of any legal texts concerning freedom of association adopted since 1992.

Slovenia

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1992)

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the comments submitted by the Association of Free Trade Unions of Slovenia (AFTUS) referring to certain acts of anti-union discrimination against trade union representatives in the private sector which, in practice, according to AFTUS, are difficult to prove. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Slovenian Labour Inspectorate has indicated that, in the period between 1 January 2008 and 1 June 2010, no infringements on the provisions of section 6 of the Employment Relationship Act that would be associated with the workers' membership in a trade union were recorded.

Act implementing the Principle of Equal Treatment (No. 93/2007, UBP (ZUNEO)). The Committee takes note of the adoption of the Act implementing the principle of equal treatment explicitly applicable to cases of anti-union discrimination. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that, in the period between 1 January 2008 and 1 June 2010, there was one case in which discrimination of the workers representative was established. In this case, the Committee notes that the inspector determined that an employer had infringed the provisions of section 4 of ZUNEO while terminating the employment contract allegedly for business reasons but for only three workers who belonged to the trade union, among whom was a trade union representative.

Act Amending the Employment Relationships Act (ERA-A) (OGRS, 103/2007). The Committee notes that the Act Amending the Employment Relationships Act has introduced the principle of reversed burden of proof in its section 6, paragraph 6. Therefore, if, in the event of a dispute, an applicant or a worker cites the fact giving ground for the suspicion that the prohibition of discrimination has been violated, the employer must demonstrate that in the case in question, the principle of equal treatment and the prohibition of discrimination was not violated. The Committee further notes that section 6, paragraph 8, states that persons who have been discriminated against and persons who help the victims of discrimination may not be exposed to unfavourable consequences owing to actions aimed at fulfilling the prohibition and discrimination. The Committee notes with interest this information.

Article 2. Protection against acts of interference. In its previous direct request, the Committee concluded that the protection against acts of interference afforded by sections 42 (right to associate) and 76 (free establishment, and functioning of, and membership in trade unions) of the Constitution, as well as section 6 of the Representativeness of Workers' Unions Act (providing that independence from employers is one of the characteristics of a representative trade union), was not sufficient and that sufficiently dissuasive sanctions were necessary. The Committee had noted the Government's indication that it would study the possibility of introducing additional legislative provisions that would address the Committee's concerns. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report, that concrete sanctions for employers or their associations in case of interference in the activities of trade unions are currently not provided for by law and that legislative amendments have not yet been adopted in this regard. The Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures in order to adopt specific provisions ensuring adequate protection to workers' organizations against acts of interference in their establishment, functioning and administration by employers or their organizations, and providing for effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions. It once again requests the Government to indicate any developments in this respect.

South Africa

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1996)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 24 August 2010, reporting in particular acts of violence and arrests of workers – including trade union leaders – during the course of demonstrations and strikes in various sectors (municipal workers, communication workers, paper workers, clothing workers, parking attendants, hotel workers, etc.), as well as the dismissal of strikers, in 2009. The Committee wishes to recall as a general principle that trade union rights include the right to organize and participate in public demonstrations and the authorities should resort to the use of force only in situations where law and order is seriously threatened. The Committee further notes that, according to the ITUC, although the right to strike is recognized for all workers including in the public sector, it is undermined by the legal right of employers to hire replacement workers during a strike. The Committee recalls that in 2008 the ITUC had sent comments on serious infringement of trade union rights including attempts to obstruct unionization in the agricultural and communication sectors, police repression during a general strike and, in the mine sector, intimidation and mass dismissals following strikes. While taking due note of the Government's report on the implementation of the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to provide its observations to the ITUC's comments of 2008 and 2010.

Spain

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1977)

Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it noted with satisfaction Ruling No. 236/2007 of the Constitutional Court declaring unconstitutional section 11 of the Act respecting foreign nationals (Basic Act No. 8/2000 on the rights of foreign nationals in Spain and their social integration), which made the right of foreign nationals to organize or to join an occupational organization freely, under the same conditions as Spanish workers, subject to obtaining a permit to stay or reside in Spain. In this respect, the Committee notes with satisfaction the Government's indication in its report of the adoption of Act No. 2/2009 of 11 December, reforming Basic Act No. 4/2000 and integrating into the provisions of the Act the contents of Rulings Nos 236/2007 of 7 November and 259/2007 of 19 December of the Constitutional Court, which found that the requirement imposed by Basic Act No. 4/2000 on foreign nationals to be legally resident in Spain in order to exercise the fundamental rights of assembly, association, trade union membership and strike constituted an unjustified restriction and are therefore contrary to the Constitution. The Committee observes that the new section 11 of Basic Act No. 4/2000, in accordance with the wording set out in Basic Act No. 2/2009, provides that foreign nationals shall have the right to organize freely or to join an occupational organization and to exercise the right to strike under the same conditions as Spanish workers.

Sri Lanka

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1995)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 29 August 2008. The Committee further notes the comments submitted by the Lanka Jathika Estate Workers' Union (LJEWU) dated 2 August 2010, and by ITUC dated 24 August 2010. It notes in particular that the ITUC refers to certain restrictions on the right to strike in sectors which do not provide essential services. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that a project entitled "Promotion of Principles and Fundamental Rights at Work" is being implemented by the Ministry of Labour Relations and Productivity Promotion in collaboration with the ILO; and that a Special National Labour Advisory Council Meeting will take place in this framework in September 2010, in order to reach consensus among the social partners to effectively address the issues related to the implementation of ILO Convention No. 87, the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), and the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135). The Committee trusts that these initiatives will result in legislative amendments which will bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention. The Committee hopes that, in this process, due account will be taken of its comments, and requests the Government to provide information thereon in its next report.

Article 2 of the Convention. Minimum age. In its previous observation, the Committee noted the discrepancy between the minimum age for admission to employment and the minimum age for trade union membership and pointed out that the minimum age for trade union membership should be the same as the minimum age for admission to employment. The Committee noted the Government's statement that a proposal initiated by the ILO-IPEC Sri Lanka programme to increase the minimum age for employment to 16 years – the same minimum age as for trade union membership – was being pursued. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that this issue will be taken up by the Labour Law Reform Committee and that consultations are being held in this regard with all stakeholders. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any developments in this regard.

Articles 2 and 5. Public servants. Previously, the Committee had underlined the need to amend the Trade Unions Ordinance of 1935 (CAP 138) in order to ensure that organizations of Government staff officers may join confederations of their own choosing, including organizations of workers in the private sector, and that first-level organizations of public employees may cover more than one ministry or department in the public service. The Committee noted that the Government reiterated that the matter had been given priority under the overall labour law reforms by the subcommittee appointed by the National Labour Advisory Council (NLAC), that the Labour Law Reform Committee had examined the proposed amendment and made recommendations to the NLAC, that the matter was under serious consideration by the Ministry of Public Administration and Home Affairs, and follow-up action was being taken by the Ministry of Labour Relations and Manpower. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report, that while the law restricts the organization of trade unions for more than one department or service, as well as the federation of trade unions in the public sectors (section 21 of the Trade Union Ordinance), in practice, nine federations of public service trade unions directly bargain with the Ministry of Public Administration about the rights, terms and conditions of employment of civil servants. The Government's report adds that the restrictions in the law have never deprived public officers' unions from exercising their right to freedom of association and that action is being taken, in consultation with the Ministry of Public Administration, to bring the law in line with the Convention. The Committee expresses the hope that the amendments to the Trade Unions Ordinance will be adopted in the near future and requests the Government to take the necessary measures to harmonize the legislation with what appears to be the practice, in order to ensure that trade unions in the public sector may join confederations of their own choosing, and to indicate the progress made in this respect in its next report.

Article 3. Dispute settlement machinery in the public sector. In its previous observation, the Committee noted that the Industrial Disputes Act – which provides for conciliation, arbitration, industrial court and labour tribunal procedures – did not apply to the public service, that a mechanism for dispute prevention and settlement in the public sector was being developed by the Ministry of Labour Relations and Manpower and the Ministry of Public Administration and Home Affairs with technical assistance from the ILO, and that a document concerning the dispute settlement mechanism had been adopted. The Committee notes that the Government refers in this respect to a draft report on the ILO Project for the Prevention and Solution of Disputes in the Public Sector, which provides in particular that: (i) the level of collective action in the public sector is very high and has a heavy impact on the efficiency of the whole public administration; (ii) the first proposal to be submitted to the social partners would be to distinguish between “rights disputes” and “interest disputes”; (iii) for “interest disputes” arising out of demands for employment improvement and working conditions, mediation and conciliation could be options available to the parties; and (iv) that a reference to the National Arbitration Board could be used as a last resort bearing in mind that, exception being made for some public services, it should remain a voluntary process for both parties. The Committee recalls that the prohibition of the right to strike in the public service should be limited to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or in essential services in the strict sense of the term, i.e. services the interruption of which, would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures, following the report on the ILO project, so that public service dispute settlement mechanisms referred to by the Government will be developed in conformity with this principle.

Compulsory arbitration. In its previous observation, the Committee expressed concern at the broad authority of the Minister to refer disputes to compulsory arbitration and recalled the need to ensure that workers’ organizations can organize their programmes and activities without interference by the public authorities. It noted that under section 4(1) of the Industrial Disputes Act, the Minister may, if he or she is of the opinion that an industrial dispute is a minor dispute, refer it by an order in writing for settlement by arbitration to an arbitrator appointed by the Minister or to a labour tribunal, notwithstanding that the parties to such dispute or their representatives do not consent to such reference, and under section 4(2), the Minister may, by an order in writing, refer any industrial dispute to an industrial court for settlement. The Committee notes that the Government once again reiterates in its report that sections 4(1) and 4(2) were intended to provide safeguards against strikes that are likely to seriously affect the national economy, and that in practice, however, arbitration was seldom imposed without the consent of the trade union. While noting that the Government further indicates that consultations were held to set up a public service dispute settlement mechanism with ILO technical assistance (as referred to above), the Committee recalls that provisions under which, at the request of one of the parties or at the discretion of the public authorities, disputes must be referred to a compulsory arbitration procedure, make it possible to prohibit virtually all strikes, or to end them quickly; such a prohibition seriously limits the means available to trade unions to further and defend the interests of their members, as well as their right to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes, and is not compatible with Article 3 of the Convention (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 153). In these circumstances, the Committee once again requests the Government to amend sections 4(1) and 4(2) of the Industrial Disputes Act, so as to ensure that any reference to compulsory arbitration may only occur: (i) at the request of both parties to the dispute (i.e. voluntary arbitration); (ii) in the case of essential services in the strict sense of the term; and (iii) in the case of public servants exercising authority in the name of the State. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any developments in this regard in its next report.

Article 4. Dissolution of organizations. In its previous observation, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that in all cases where an administrative decision of dissolution of a trade union is appealed to the courts, the administrative decision will not take effect until the final decision is handed down. The Committee noted the Government’s indication that this matter had been referred to the Labour Law Reform Committee. The Committee notes that the Government’s report provides information on the procedure for the withdrawal or cancellation of the registration of a trade union, including the appeal procedures against the decisions of the registrar, but does not confirm that the decision of the registrar will not take effect until the final decision of the appeal procedure is handed down. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that administrative decisions of dissolution are suspended pending their appeal in court, and to indicate any progress in this respect in its next report.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1972)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the Ceylon Bank Employees’ Union (CBEU) dated 16 February 2009 as well as by the Lanka Jathika Estate Workers’ Union (LJEWU) dated 2 August 2010 and by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 24 August 2010.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that a project entitled “Promotion of Principles and Fundamental Rights at Work” is being implemented by the Ministry of Labour Relations and Productivity Promotion in collaboration with the ILO and that a Special National Labour Advisory Council Meeting would take place in this framework in September 2010, in order to reach consensus among the social partners to effectively address the deficits in the implementation of ILO Convention No. 98, the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Workers’ Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135).

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. In its previous observation, the Committee noted that under section 43(1A) of the 1999 Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act, any contravention of the provisions concerning anti-union discrimination shall be punished by a fine not exceeding 20,000 rupees (approximately US$175) and requested the Government to provide information on the dissuasive character of this provision, in particular as regards the relationship of the amount of the fine with the average wage. The Committee noted the Government’s indication that there was no relationship between the amount of the fine and the average wage, that a proposal had been initiated to revise and update penalties, surcharges and stamp duties under existing labour legislation and that this matter had been referred to the National Labour Advisory Council (NLAC) in order to obtain the views of the social partners. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that, on the recommendations of the Labour Law Reform Committee, it has decided to increase the fine up to 100,000 rupees and that a Bill was drafted in this sense, which will be presented to the Parliament in the next few months. The Committee recalls that Article 1 of the Convention guarantees workers adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and that legislation prohibiting acts of discrimination is inadequate if it is not coupled with effective, expeditious procedures and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions to ensure their application (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraphs 223 and 224). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the views of the social partners are fully taken into consideration in the drafting process of updating penalties, to indicate any progress made in this respect in its next report, and to provide a copy of the Bill once adopted.

Furthermore, the Committee had previously noted allegations according to which adequate protection against anti-union discrimination was not provided in practice, as only the Department of Labour could bring cases before the Magistrate’s Court and that there were no mandatory time limits within which complaints should be made to the Court. The Committee had requested the Government to take measures in consultation with the social partners to guarantee a more expeditious and adequate procedure which, in particular, would establish short time periods for the examination of the cases by the authorities, and to indicate whether trade unions had the capacity to bring their grievances concerning anti-union discrimination directly before the courts. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that: (i) the courts always try to conclude cases as expeditiously as possible while accommodating the concerns of all parties and the principles of law; (ii) the opportunity of granting trade unions the right to bring anti-union discrimination claims directly before the courts will be closely examined, taking into account the difficulties which may arise in relation to the collection of the requested evidences by the unions; (iii) concern should also be given to the possibility for employers to bring claims before the courts in cases of unfair labour practices by the trade unions; and that (iv) the Government wishes to further negotiate the issue with the social partners in the framework of the Special National Labour Advisory Council Meeting of September 2010 and inquire from the Attorney General the feasibility of granting such rights. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures, in consultation with the social partners, to guarantee a more expeditious and adequate procedure which would, in particular, establish short time periods for the examination of cases by the judicial authorities, and to provide information in this regard in its next report.

Finally, the Committee notes the communication submitted by the Government dated 26 January 2009 in response to the petition submitted by the CBEU dated 17 October 2008 concerning alleged acts of discrimination against trade union members, in particular retrenchment measures adopted by the employer which lead to the termination of employment of 97 employees members of the CBEU, in violation of a collective agreement in force. The Committee notes the comments submitted by the employer involved. The Committee also notes that the Government indicates in its report that the conflict arose as a result of a merger of two financial institutions and that the Court of Appeal, in this case, rejected the requests of the CBEU.

Article 4. Measures to promote collective bargaining. In its previous observation, the Committee requested the Government to indicate the measures taken by the Social Dialogue and Workplace Cooperation Unit (SDWC) as well as the measures taken under the auspices of the National Policy for Decent Work, to promote collective bargaining. The Committee noted that 29 Provincial Labour Advisory Councils (PLACs) were established in order to promote collective bargaining and tripartite consultations in a decentralized manner, and that their activities were coordinated by the SDWC Unit. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the most representative trade unions’ and employers’ organizations are consulted by the PLACs on labour matters and that it provides, with its report, a list of collective agreements concluded between 2008 and 2010. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of any progress achieved by the measures taken by the Social Dialogue and Workplace Cooperation Unit and those taken in furtherance of the National Policy for Decent Work to promote collective bargaining.

Export processing zones (EPZs). In its previous observation, as regards the need to promote collective bargaining within the EPZ sector, the Committee noted the information provided by the Government according to which 40 per cent of EPZ enterprises have employees’ councils that have bargaining rights, and that some of them were in the process of concluding collective agreements. The Committee also noted that, according to the ITUC, employees' councils were bodies funded by the employer without workers' contributions – thus giving them an advantage over trade unions which require membership dues – and that employees' councils were promoted by the Board of Investment (BOI) as a substitute for trade unions in EPZs. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that around ten trade unions operate in EPZs and provides statistical information showing that out of 260 enterprises operating in EPZs, 25 enterprises negotiate with trade unions, 13 enterprises have granted “check-off” facility to trade unions and five have signed collective agreements. The Government's report adds that neither the Ministry of Labour, nor the BOI, promote the establishment of employees' councils or trade unions, that the BOI's role in establishing employees' councils is strictly restricted to that of a facilitator, and that registered employees' councils are entitled to bargain collectively and conclude agreements on behalf of workers where there is no trade union with bargaining status. Finally, it adds that the “Promotion of Principles and Fundamental Rights at Work” project (referred to above) has a special focus on EPZs. Given the low number of collective agreements in EPZs indicated by the Government, the Committee requests it to provide information in its next report on measures taken to promote collective bargaining in the EPZ sector, as well as information concerning complaints made by trade unions against non-independent employees' councils.

Provisions on trade union recognition. In its previous observation, the Committee had requested the Government to indicate the measures taken so as to ensure that the recognition provisions for collective bargaining purposes were effectively implemented in practice. The Committee had requested the Government in particular to comment upon the allegations made by the ITUC – reiterated this year – that the recognition of unions for collective bargaining purposes is hampered by excessive delays, and that employers tend to delay the holding of union certification polls to identify, victimize and on occasion dismiss the union activists concerned and that as a result, workers are afraid of being identified with the union, and the union loses the poll. The Committee notes that the ITUC indicates that the unions should be able to hold their elections within four weeks of sending their application for recognition. The Committee further notes that the Government indicates in its report, that a Circular adopted on 19 September 2000 sets the guidelines for the conduct of the referendum, referred to in section 32A of the Industrial Dispute Act, in order to ascertain whether a trade union possesses at least 40 per cent of the workers on whose behalf it seeks to bargain. Section 1 of the Circular provides that the relevant officer should hold a referendum (poll) within 30 days of the trade union's request. The Government's report adds that experience has shown that in the majority of the cases these time limits have been adhered to by the labour officers.

Representativeness requirements for collective bargaining. In its previous observation, the Committee had noted that, under section 32A(g) of the 1999 Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act, no employer shall refuse to bargain with a trade union which has in its membership not less than 40 per cent of the workmen on whose behalf the trade union seeks to bargain. It subsequently requested the Government to ensure that if no trade union covers more than 40 per cent of the workers, collective bargaining rights should be granted to all the unions in this unit, at least on behalf of their own members, and to indicate the measures taken in this regard. The Committee noted the Government's indication that this matter was placed before the Labour Law Reform Committee appointed by the NLAC and that the Ministry, for its part, was of the view that reducing the percentage requirement might lead to inter-union rivalry. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the issue has been taken up several times in 2010, including before the NLAC and the Labour Law Reform Committee, but that in both these forums there were no consensus amongst the trade unions themselves. The Government's report adds that the majority of trade unions therefore collectively agreed to retain the present threshold and viewed that trade unions with different views would weaken the collective bargaining power of the unions. The Committee also notes that the ITUC indicates that certain employers change their staffing figures to ensure that the 40 per cent representation target is hard to meet, for instance by including middle and top managers in the calculation of the total staff. The Committee recalls that if no union covers more than 40 per cent of the workers' collective bargaining rights should be granted to all the unions in the unit, at least on behalf of their own members. The Committee therefore requests the Government to pursue its efforts in this respect, to take the necessary measures to give effect to this principle, and to indicate the progress made in this regard in its next report.

Article 6. Denial of the right to collective bargaining in the public service. In its previous observation, the Committee considered, on the basis of the information provided by the Government, that the procedures regarding the right to collective bargaining of public sector workers do not provide for genuine collective bargaining, but rather establish a consultative mechanism – with perhaps some elements of arbitration – under which the demands of public service trade unions are considered, while the final decision on salary determination rests with the Cabinet of Ministers. The Committee notes that the Government recalls in its report that while a National Salaries and Cadre Commission was appointed in 2005 to restructure and determine salaries of public officers at all levels, it is difficult for the public administration to have different wage systems and terms and conditions for each profession, occupation and service. The Government's report adds that there is however no obstacle for trade unions in the public services to bargain with authorities on issues specific to certain professions, occupations and services. The Committee once again recalls that all public servants, with the sole possible exception of those engaged in the administration of the State, should enjoy the right to collective bargaining with respect to salaries and other conditions of employment (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 262). Noting that, as at 31 December 2008, there were 1,933 registered trade unions out of which 1,130 were public officers' unions representing 1.2 million public employees, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure and promote civil servants' right to collective bargaining in accordance with this principle, and to indicate any developments in this regard in its next report.

Furthermore, the Committee notes that a draft report on the ILO Project for the Prevention and Solution of Disputes in the Public Sector is attached to the Government's report. The draft report provides, in particular, that efforts should be made to improve industrial relations in the public sector, which should be based on the improvement of social dialogue mechanisms at different levels of decision-making and on the creation of a sound system for collective dispute settlement. More specifically, the draft report indicates that the setting up of a National Arbitration Board is high in the agenda of both trade unions and Ministry officials, and that it is conceived rather as a mechanism to regulate industrial relations, than as a last resort to settle disputes. As regards conflicts in the public sector, the Committee recalls that compulsory arbitration may only occur at the request of both parties to the dispute (i.e. voluntary arbitration), or if the conflict relates to essential services in the strict sense of the term, or if the conflict involves public servants engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the abovementioned principle is taken into account in the discussions on the mechanism for collective dispute settlement, and to provide a copy of the report once adopted.

Sudan

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in communications of 26 August 2009 and 26 August 2010, referring to the issues the Committee has been raising for a number of years and in particular, trade union monopoly controlled by the Government, denial of trade union rights in the export processing zones (EPZs) and nearly non-existent collective bargaining. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to provide its observation on similar 2008 ITUC comments. The Committee notes the Government's reply denying the ITUC allegations, which it considers general, unfounded and mostly political. It also notes the observations of the Sudanese Businessmen and Employers Federation (SBEF) and the Sudan Workers Trade Unions Federation (SWTUF). According to the SBEF, Sudanese society is characterized by an active involvement of trade union organizations, which enjoy full freedom in carrying out their activities and participate in tripartite activities, as partners of tripartite social dialogue. Finally, the SBEF indicates that it collaborates with workers and enjoys the right to bilateral negotiations to determine the conditions of work and service in conformity with the legislative provisions in force. The SWTUF concurs with the SBEF. It denies the ITUC comments and stresses the independence of the Sudanese trade union movement, the efficiency of its bodies and its democratic structure. The Committee notes that a new Trade Union Act had been adopted on 28 January 2010. The Committee requests the Government to send this legislation and to indicate if it maintains trade union monopoly.

Violence against trade unionists and repression of trade union rights. In its previous comments, the Committee expressed its deep concern over the allegations of harassment, intimidation, arbitrary arrest, detention and torture made by the ITUC. The Committee had urged the Government to take the necessary measures to guarantee the personal safety of trade unionists and ensure respect for the rights enshrined in the Convention. The Committee notes that the Government points out that these issues are of a political nature and are not related to the Convention. In this respect, the Committee recalls the Resolution of 1970 concerning trade union rights and their relation to civil liberties which recognizes that "the rights conferred upon workers' and employers' organizations must be based on respect for those civil liberties which have been enunciated in particular in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and that the absence of these civil liberties removes all meaning from the concept of trade union rights". The Resolution refers, in particular, to the right to freedom and security of person and freedom from arbitrary arrest and detention. The Committee notes with concern the most recent allegations of the ITUC on brutal and fatal repression of workers in the oil sector, who demanded improved working conditions, by security forces. The Committee notes that the Government states that no arrests of workers have occurred at the company in question. The Committee points out that, according to the ITUC, two workers were shot and injured. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on the ITUC allegations. It urges the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged to guarantee the personal safety of trade unionists and ensure respect for the rights enshrined in the Convention. Recalling that trade union rights can only be exercised in a climate that is free from violence and intimidation, the Committee requests the Government to ensure observance of civil liberties and human rights.

Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that it had observed that section 112 of the 1997 Labour Code allowed referral of a collective dispute or a collective labour dispute to compulsory arbitration and had requested the Government to take measures to amend the legislation so that arbitration may only be compulsory with the agreement of both parties, or in the case of essential services. The Committee notes that the ITUC comments also refer to this issue. In this respect, the Committee had previously noted the Government's indication that a new Labour Code was being prepared (the Committee understands that the reference was made to the draft Labour Code for Northern Sudan) and requested the Government to keep it informed of the progress made in this respect. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the law currently in force is the Labour Code of 1997, which provides for optional phases of resolving conflicts and that a draft Labour Code was sent to the ILO Office in Cairo for review, advice and comments. The Committee has been informed that the Office has indeed provided its assistance with regard to the draft Labour Act of Southern Sudan, section 117(1) of which stipulates that parties “may agree” to refer their dispute to arbitration, however no request for assistance was formally made with regard to the draft Labour Code for Northern Sudan, which is currently pending before the Federal Assembly. The Committee expresses the hope that the new Labour Code (for Northern Sudan) will ensure that compulsory arbitration may only be permitted with the agreement of both parties or in the case of essential services. It requests the Government to provide a copy of the said Code as well as a copy of the Labour Act of Southern Sudan, once these legislative texts are adopted.

Collective bargaining in practice. The Committee previously noted the ITUC’s allegation that collective bargaining was nearly non-existent and that salaries were set by a government-appointed and controlled tripartite body. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the Higher Council for Wages, a body responsible for preparing collective agreements and studies on minimum wages, has a tripartite structure. The Government further indicates that it is up to employers and workers at the level of undertaking, factory, province and industry to engage in open bargaining between each other in order to reach agreements which determine their wages. The Government states that there are many collective agreements attesting to it and provides a copy of one such agreement. The Committee requests the Government to keep providing information on the application of the right of collective bargaining in practice, including the number of existing collective agreements as well as the sectors and workers covered, as well as the ways the authorities promote the exercise of this right.

Scope of the application of the Convention. On the issue of trade union rights in the EPZs, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that legislative texts clearly determine the exempted categories of workers employed in the oil exporting zones and the Port of Sudan. The Committee requests the Government to transmit the relevant legislative texts.

The Committee recalls that the only possible exemptions from the application of the Convention are the armed forces, police and public servants engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that all workers engaged in the EPZs and the Port of Sudan can enjoy the rights provided to them under the Convention.

Swaziland

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes the information provided in the Government’s reports and the comments, dated 27 August 2010, of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) concerning the issues under examination, as well as allegations of government interference in union affairs and further elaboration around the 2010 May Day incident. The Committee takes note of the comments made by the Government to the ITUC allegations and in particular its assurances that the public service enjoys the freedom of association and right to organize in terms of the Industrial Relations Act, 2000 (as amended) and that as a result, four unions are active and recognized: the Swaziland National Association of Teachers (SNAT), the Swaziland National Association of Government Accounting Personnel (SNAGAP), the Swaziland National Association of Civil Servants (SNACS) and the Swaziland Nurses Association (SNA). According to the Government, these unions bargain with the Government collectively and freely without intimidation. In light of the allegations made by the ITUC that the Public Service Bill currently before Parliament infringed the organizational rights of public sector workers, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the impact that this Bill might have on the rights of public service workers under the Convention and to transmit a copy of the Bill.

The Committee notes the discussion which took place in the Conference Committee in June 2010. The Committee observes that the Conference Committee continued to raise its concern over the lack of progress made on matters that had been raised for many years now and had thus decided to place its conclusions once again in a special paragraph. Further, observing that the Conference Committee had urged the Government to accept a high-level tripartite mission, in order to assist the Government in bringing the legislation into full conformity with the Convention, to inquire into the 2010 May Day incident and to facilitate the promotion of meaningful and effective social dialogue in the country, the Committee welcomes the Government’s acceptance of this mission, which visited the country from 25–28 October 2010. The Committee notes the report of this tripartite mission, its conclusions and recommendations.

The Committee notes with interest from the mission report that certain provisions of the Industrial Relations Act (IRA), upon which it has been commenting for many years, have been amended by the House of Assembly and Senate, were awaiting royal assent and should be shortly promulgated into law. In particular, the Committee observes that Industrial Relations (Amendment) Bill No. 6 of 2010 would appear to:

- provide for the right to organize for domestic workers, by including domestic service in a household or a private house within the definition of “undertaking” (section 2(b) and (c) of the Bill);
- remove the restrictions on the nomination and eligibility of candidates for trade union office in section 29(1)(i) of the IRA;

- ensure that the supervision of strike ballots by the Conciliation, Mediation and Arbitration Commission (CMAC) provided for in section 86 of the IRA may only occur upon request by an organization in terms of its statute or constitution; and
- shorten the compulsory dispute settlement procedures provided in section 85(4) of the IRA by limiting the period for arbitration to 21 days.

The Committee observes from the latest information provided by the Government that the Bill has received royal assent and is now published as the Industrial Relations (Amendment) Act No. 6 of 2010. The Committee trusts that the Amendment Act fully addresses the abovementioned issues and requests the Government to transmit a copy of the IR (Amendment) Act No. 6 of 2010.

As regards its previous request that the Government amend the IRA to recognize the right to strike in sanitary services (at present banned by IRA section 93(9)), and establish only a minimum service with the participation of workers and employers in the definition of such a service, the Committee observes that the Bill provides for a clear definition of “sanitary services” in section 2. It further understands from the mission report that the Government intends to have discussions with the social partners within the framework of the Essential Services Committee for the determination of the minimum service that should be provided with respect to sanitary services. The Committee notes from the latest information provided by the Government that the Essential Services Committee has discussed this issue with the trade union and the Staff Association. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the discussions held in this regard and the final outcome with respect to the determination of the minimum service to be afforded for sanitary services.

Finally, noting from the Government’s report that a proposal to amend section 40 (civil liability of trade union leaders) and section 97(1) (criminal liability of trade union leaders) of the IRA would be brought before the Labour Advisory Board before June 2011, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on all progress made in this regard.

As regards the need to take measures to amend the legislation so as to guarantee for prison staff the right to organize in defence of their economic and social interests, the Committee recalls that in its previous comments it had noted the Government’s indication that consultations had already been initiated to review the Prisons’ Act. The Committee further notes from the mission report that the Supreme Court judgment in relation to the organizational rights of the Correctional Services Union refers to the possibility of adopting appropriate legislation for these workers to enjoy their rights under the Convention, with the exception of the right to strike. Noting from the Government’s latest report that a zero draft of the Correctional Services Bill was being developed, the Committee urges the Government to consult rapidly the social partners on the measures required in this regard and to propose the necessary legislative amendments without further delay.

Furthermore, the Committee recalls that its previous comments referred to the following legal acts and proclamations which gave rise to practices contrary to the provisions of the Convention:

- The 1973 Proclamation and its implementing regulations. The Committee takes note of the information provided by the Government in relation to the status of this Proclamation and in particular the “Attorney-General’s Opinion”, which states that “on the coming into force of the Constitution, the Proclamation died a natural death”. The Committee observes, however, from the mission report that, despite assurances of the Government to the contrary, the social partners considered that there remained a certain ambiguity and uncertainty in respect of the residual existence of the Proclamation. In line with the mission’s recommendations, the Committee would request the Government to take all necessary steps to clarify that all provisions of the 1973 Proclamation were now null and void.
- The 1963 Public Order Act. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the Act so as to ensure that it could not be used to repress lawful and peaceful strike action. The Committee observes from the conclusions of the mission that, despite the provisions exempting trade union meetings from the scope of the Act, it appeared that the Act was resorted to in respect of trade union activities if it was considered that these activities included matters relating to broader calls for democratic reforms of interest to trade union members. In this respect, the Committee observes that the ban on displaying any flag, banner or other emblem signifying association with a political organization or with the promotion of a political object, which was added to the Act in 1968, apparently has affected the right of trade unions carry out peaceful protest actions. The Committee observes from the latest information provided by the Government that the Ministry of Labour and Social Security was invited to a meeting between the police and the trade unions on 16 November 2010 in preparation for a protest action the following day. The Government indicates that it views the Ministry’s participation at these consultation meetings as a positive development. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the steps taken to ensure that the 1963 Public Order Act is not used in practice to repress lawful and peaceful strike action, including any police guidelines or other instructions that may be elaborated to this end, as well as to indicate the measures taken to amend the Act where its provisions may have given rise to undue interference in trade union meetings or protest actions.

The Committee notes with grave concern from the Conference Committee discussion and the mission report the serious disruption of the 2010 May Day demonstrations, the series of arrests and finally the death in custody of a participant in the demonstrations who had been arrested for wearing a t-shirt with the name of a political organization proscribed under the 2008 Suppression of Terrorism Act. The Committee observes that the Government immediately appointed a coroner to carry out an official investigation into the circumstances surrounding this death and requests the Government to provide a copy of the coroner's report as soon as it is concluded.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes the information provided in the Government's report, as well as the comments of the International Confederation of Trade Union (ITUC), which refer to issues already under examination, as well as to a number of acts of anti-union discrimination in the textile sector and in export processing zones (EPZs), and to the denial of collective bargaining to prison staff and problems in practice in the banking sector, demonstrating weaknesses in the collective bargaining machinery. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the Government's indication that the issue of anti-union discrimination in the textile sector was being addressed and a report would be submitted in due course. The Committee notes the Government's response to these allegations. In particular, the Government states that there are two powerful trade unions in the EPZs: the Swaziland Manufacturing and Allied Workers Union (SMAWU) and the Swaziland Processing Refining and Allied Workers Unions (SPRAWU) and that they are fully covered by the rights consecrated in the Constitution and the Industrial Relations Act, 2000, as amended. As the Government does not specifically address the allegations of anti-union discrimination in the EPZs in practice, the Committee requests it to provide any available information and statistics from the labour inspectorate in this regard, as well as any remedial measures eventually taken.

The Committee recalls that its previous comments referred to the following points:

- the need to adopt specific provisions accompanied by sufficiently dissuasive sanctions for the protection of workers' organizations against acts of interference by employers or their organizations (Article 2 of the Convention); and
- the need to adopt a specific legislative provision so as to ensure that, if no union covers more than 50 per cent of the workers, this does not prevent the exercise of the collective bargaining rights of the unions in the unit at least on behalf of their own members (Article 4 of the Convention).

The Committee notes with satisfaction that section 42 of the Industrial Relations Act (IRA) has been amended so as to provide that, where in an establishment employees are represented by more than two trade unions whose respective membership does not cover at least 50 per cent of the employees eligible to join the union, the employer shall grant collective bargaining rights to the unions to negotiate on behalf of their members (now published as the Industrial Relations (Amendment) Act No. 6 of 2010).

The Committee recalls that, in its previous comments, it had noted the Government's indication that the issue of the adoption of specific provisions, accompanied by sufficiently dissuasive sanctions, for the protection of workers' organizations against acts of interference by employers or their organizations, as required by Article 2 of the Convention, was being addressed. The Committee regrets that the Government has not provided any information on the developments in this regard. It requests the Government to put this matter before the Labour Advisory Board or the Steering Committee on Social Dialogue so as to ensure that workers and their organizations are effectively protected against acts of interference and anti-union discrimination, in accordance with the Convention.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1949)

The Committee refers to the observation formulated as regards the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1950)

The Committee notes the comments made by the Swedish Trade Union Confederation (LO) and the Swedish Confederation of Professional Employees (TCO) on the application of the Convention within the framework of the European Court of Justice (ECJ) judgment in the case Laval un Partneri v. Svenska Byggnadsarbetareförbundet (Laval). The LO and the TCO refer in particular to the ex post facto application of the interpretation given to European Union law in the Laval judgment with regard to the industrial action giving rise to that case and the punitive damages and legal fees levied against the unions, as well as the subsequent legislative amendments to the Foreign Posting of Employees Act and the Co-determination Act of 1976, as well as other matters which they consider to undermine collective bargaining. The Committee takes due note of the Government's report in which it touches upon the questions raised in a general manner and informs the Committee of the adoption of the new legislation and of the Government's additional reply to the comments made by the Swedish trade unions, received on 30 November 2010. The Committee requests the Government to send detailed information on all of the matters raised, including in further response to the views of the social partners.

The Committee observes that the matters raised by the LO and the TCO touch upon both the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and Convention No. 98, and that the unions highlight the intrinsic link between collective bargaining rights and effective industrial action. Given the importance of the matters raised by the LO and the TCO, and the significance of the potential effect of the recent measures taken in the country, the Committee requests the Government to monitor the impact of these legislative changes on the rights under the Convention and provide a detailed report in time for its examination at the Committee's next meeting in November–December 2011.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee takes note of the Government. It also notes the communications of September 2010 from the Union of Swiss Employers (UPS) and the Swiss Federation of Trade Unions (USS). Lastly, the Committee notes the communication of 24 August 2010 from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC). The Committee requests the Government to send observations thereon.

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union dismissals. In its previous comments the Committee noted the observations by the USS, endorsed by the ITUC, objecting, on the basis of cases ruled on by the courts, that protection against anti-union dismissals was not adequate. The Committee also noted the Government's reply maintaining, on the contrary, that protection against anti-union acts, including recourse to the courts, is adequate. According to the Government, Swiss law offers adequate protection to trade union delegates and representatives, thereby fully complying with the Convention; the compensation for unfair dismissal which may amount to as much as six months' pay is sufficiently dissuasive given that the great majority of Swiss firms are small and medium-sized enterprises. The Government added that parliament had been unwilling to incorporate in Swiss law on employment contracts the principle of reinstatement of the dismissed worker, which in any event is not required by the Convention; so there was no question of proposing an amendment to the law to introduce further protection against acts of anti-union discrimination as it would be doomed in advance to failure. Lastly, the Government stated that following the adoption in November 2004 of the interim conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2265, the matter had been notified to the Tripartite Federal Committee for ILO Affairs, but in the absence of agreement, it was not deemed necessary to take measures to strengthen protection against unfair dismissal on anti-union grounds or make it more effective in practice. The Committee expressed the view that while the applicable compensation for unfair dismissal (up to six months' wages) may be a deterrent for small and medium-sized enterprises, this is not so for high productivity and large enterprises. It accordingly asked the Government to resume tripartite dialogue in the light of its comments on the issue of adequate protection against anti-union dismissals.

The Committee notes that in its latest report, the Government again expresses serious concern that the Committee should apply to the Convention principles drawn from the interim conclusions of a case that is under examination by the Committee on Freedom of Association and is narrower in scope. The UPS endorses this position in its latest communication. The Committee furthermore notes the information sent by the Government that the Federal Council decided on 16 December 2009 to reconsider the matter of penalties for unfair dismissal, including the dismissal of elected staff representatives, dismissal for membership or non-membership of a trade union or for lawful trade union activity, but solely for the purpose of looking into an increase of the maximum penalty and not of replacing the principle of compensation with reinstatement of the worker. The Committee notes that according to the Government's report, the first draft of a bill is to be debated in the autumn of 2010 with specific proposals for amendments to the law. The Committee notes that in its latest communication, dated 17 September 2010, the USS indicates that there are still anti-union practices and dismissals and that the legislation has no dissuasive effect at all on employers, and particularly large enterprises. The USS states that it has submitted many new cases of anti-union dismissals to the Government with a view to amendment of the legislation, but to no avail so far. However, while objecting that the Government has taken no action despite the ILO's recommendations, the USS welcomes the Government's initiative to hold consultations on improving protection against dismissal which were to start in September 2010. The Committee takes note of this information, welcomes the decision of the Federal Council and hopes that the consultations on improving protection against unfair dismissal, including dismissal on anti-union grounds, will take account of the comments it has been making for several years on the application of Article 1 of the Convention. It hopes that in its next report the Government will provide information on the outcome of the consultations and the measures taken.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. In its previous comments the Committee asked the Government to indicate how the law and case law address improper practices in collective bargaining (proven bad faith, unwarranted delay in the bargaining process, failure to comply with agreements, etc.), and to indicate any measures taken to promote the broadest possible development and use of machinery for the voluntary negotiation of collective agreements. In 2008 the Government referred to the case law concerning the obligation to engage in collective bargaining, indicating that precedent also establishes an obligation to negotiate in good faith. The Committee asked the Government to provide copies of the court rulings in question together with any other relevant rulings on improper practices in collective bargaining. The Committee notes that for the period covered by the report, the Government indicates that there have been no court rulings involving matters pertaining to the application of the convention. The Committee requests the Government to send a copy of the case law to which it referred in its 2008 report. It also asks the Government to send up to date statistical information on the number of collective agreements by sector and the number of workers covered.

Syrian Arab Republic

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 24 August 2010 concerning the application of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon in its next report.

Article 2 of the Convention. Trade union monopoly. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated so as to repeal or amend the legislative provisions establishing a regime of trade union monopoly (sections 3, 4, 5 and 7 of Legislative Decree No. 84; sections 4, 6, 8, 13, 14 and 15 of Legislative Decree No. 3, amending Legislative Decree No. 84; section 2 of Legislative Decree No. 250 of 1969; and sections 26–31 of Act No. 21 of 1974). The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the majority of workers confirmed their position independently by declaring, through their trade union congresses, their wish to hold on to the General Federation of Trade Unions (GFTU) as a single union organization. The Committee notes that the Government's statement is once again corroborated by the comments of the GFTU forwarded by the ITUC. While taking due note of the above information, the Committee must once again recall that although it is generally to the advantage of workers and employers to avoid proliferation of competing organizations, trade union unity, imposed directly or indirectly, by law runs counter to the standards expressly laid down in the Convention. Although it was clearly not the purpose of the Convention to make trade union diversity an obligation, it does at the very least require this diversity to remain possible in all cases (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 91). The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated so as to repeal or amend the legislative provisions which establish a regime of trade union monopoly so as to allow possible trade union diversity.

Article 3. Financial administration of organizations. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 18(a) of Legislative Decree No. 84, as amended by section 4(5) of Legislative Decree No. 30 of 1982, so as to lift the power of the Minister to set the conditions and procedures for the investment of trade union funds in financial services and industrial sectors. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the GFTU reiterated that it is a financially independent organization, that it has the full right to dispose of its funds in the manner it sees appropriate for their investment without the interference of anybody whatsoever in accordance with Act No. 25 of 2000, and that it invests its funds in particular in establishing hotels and tourist agglomerations, without interference. The Committee recalls, with regard to the financial administration of workers' organizations, that legislative provisions that give authorities the right to restrict the freedom of trade unions to invest, administer and utilize their funds as they wish for normal and lawful trade union purposes are incompatible with the principles of freedom of association. Therefore, taking into account what appears to be the practice and in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the principle of freedom of association, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 18(a) of Legislative Decree No. 84, as amended by section 4(5) of Legislative Decree No. 30 of 1982, in accordance with the abovementioned principle. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken or contemplated in this respect in its next report.

Right of organizations to elect their representatives in full freedom. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to repeal or amend the legislative provisions which determine the composition of the GFTU Congress and its presiding officers (section 1(4) of Act No. 29 of 1986, amending Legislative Decree No. 84). The Committee notes that the Government does not refer to these issues in its report. The Committee recalls that it should be up to trade union constitutions and rules to establish the composition and presiding officers of trade union congresses; national legislation should only lay down formal requirements in this respect; any legislative provisions going beyond such formal requirements constitute interference contrary to Article 3 of the Convention (General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 109 and 111). The Committee, therefore, once again requests the Government to provide specific information on the measures taken or contemplated to repeal or amend section 1(4) of Act No. 29 of 1986, amending Legislative Decree No. 84, in accordance with the abovementioned principle. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken or contemplated in this respect in its next report.

Furthermore in its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to indicate the provisions which explicitly amend section 44(B)(3) of Legislative Decree No. 84 so as to allow a certain percentage of trade union officers to be non-Arab. The Committee had noted that, according to the Government, Legislative Decree No. 25 of 2000 amending Legislative Decree No. 84 of 1968 explicitly provides for the right of non-Syrian workers to join occupational trade unions, and that the law does not set down any discriminatory restrictions or provisions on the possibility of election of workers as trade union officers, regardless of their nationality. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that every worker is allowed to become a member of a trade union to which he/she is affiliated, and that as long as he/she is affiliated to a trade union, he/she has the right to nominate himself/herself to leading union posts.

Right to strike. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to indicate the progress made with regard to the adoption of draft amendments to provisions which restrict the right to strike by imposing heavy sanctions including imprisonment (sections 330, 332, 333 and 334 of Legislative Decree No. 148 of 1949, issuing the Penal Code). The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the amendment procedure takes time, that it will keep the Committee informed of any new developments and that the Ministry of Justice will take the Committee's comments into account. The Committee recalls that no penal sanction should be imposed against a worker for having carried out a peaceful strike and therefore measures of imprisonment should not be imposed on any account. Such sanctions could be envisaged only where during a strike, violence against persons or property or other serious infringements of rights have been committed, and can be imposed pursuant to legislation punishing such acts. The Committee expresses the hope that the measures envisaged to bring the legislation in conformity with the Convention will be adopted in the near future, in accordance with the abovementioned principle. It requests the Government to provide, with its next report, a copy of the amendments as adopted.

The Committee reminds the Government that, if it so wishes, it may include the issues under this Convention when receiving the technical assistance of the Office it has requested under the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 24 August 2010 concerning the failure to implement collective bargaining rights, for union representatives can only participate with employers' representatives and the supervising ministry in the establishment of minimum wages, or hours and conditions of employment.

Article 4 of the Convention. Collective bargaining in practice. In its previous observation, the Committee noted that for the second consecutive year, the Government indicated in its report that no collective agreement had been concluded in the last three years since none of the social partners had expressed the need for it. The Committee wished to draw the Government's attention to the terms of Article 4 of the Convention, which states that measures appropriate to national conditions shall be taken, where necessary, to encourage and promote the full development and utilization of machinery for voluntary negotiation between employers or employers' organizations and workers' organizations, with a view to the regulation of terms and conditions of employment by means of collective agreements. The Committee therefore urged the Government to indicate in its next report the measures to promote collective bargaining adopted by the national authorities in both the public and private sectors and reminded it of the possibility of requesting technical assistance from the Office in this respect.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the Labour Code No. 17 of 2010 contains an entire chapter on collective bargaining (sections 178–202) and adds that collaboration is ongoing with the Chamber of Industry and the General Federation of Trade Unions to issue an order by the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs to clarify the mechanism for collective bargaining, and will transmit it to the Office as soon as it is issued. The Committee welcomes the request by the Government for ILO's technical assistance in order to clarify the mechanism for the promotion of collective bargaining so as to encourage its use by representatives of workers and employers. The Committee, while expressing its concern about the deficient application of the Convention in practice, trusts that the requested technical assistance will take place in the very near future and requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated by national authorities to promote collective bargaining, in both the public and private sectors.

United Republic of Tanzania

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the 2009 comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), as well as the comments submitted by the ITUC in a communication dated 24 August 2010 concerning issues already raised by the Committee.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish organizations. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to amend section 2(1)(iii) of the Employment and Labour Relations Act No. 6 of 2004 (ELRA) so that prison guards enjoy the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that account will be taken of the Committee's observations. The Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures without delay to amend section 2(1)(iii) of the ELRA so that prison guards enjoy the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, and provide information on any progress made thereon in its next report.

In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to provide information on the types of workers included in the category of the "national service" referred to in section 2(1)(iv) of the ELRA – which is excluded from the provisions of the ELRA – so that it may assess whether they qualify for the exceptions of Article 9 of the Convention. The Committee had noted that the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Youth Development was at a preparatory stage of formulating rules on the definition of the category of workers included in the national service. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that as regards the national service, the rules and regulations for the implementation of the ELRA and the Labour Institutions Act are not yet finalized. The Committee recalls that only the armed forces and the police may be deprived of the rights provided in the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that these rules and regulations will be adopted in the near future, and to provide information thereon in its next report, as well as a copy of the regulations once adopted.

Right of workers and employers to establish organizations without previous authorization. In its previous observation, the Committee had noted that section 48 of the ELRA, which provides for the process of registration, does not set forth a time period within which the registrar must either approve or refuse an organization's application, and had requested the Government to consider amending the ELRA so as to provide for a reasonable time period for the processing of applications for registration. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates in its report that the rules and regulations referred to above will address this matter. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the rules and regulations will provide for a reasonable time period for the processing of applications for registration, and to provide information on any progress made thereon in its next report.

Article 3. Right of organizations freely to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. In its previous observation, the Committee had noted that while sections 4 and 85 of the ELRA allow for protest action (i.e. strikes in disputes that are not interest disputes) under section 4, such action is not lawful when taking place in relation to "a dispute in respect of which there is a legal remedy" which, according to the Government, refers to any dispute in which a party may apply for relief in any authority with competent jurisdiction. The Committee therefore requested the Government to amend section 4 of the ELRA so that restrictions on protest actions would be limited to a rights dispute. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report, that the Committee's observations will be communicated to stakeholders for consultation. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made thereon in its next report.

Furthermore the Committee had requested the Government to amend section 76(3)(a) of the ELRA, which prohibits picketing in support of a strike or in opposition to a lawful lockout. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the Committee's observations will be communicated to stakeholders for consultation. The Committee expects that, following consultations, due measures will be taken to amend section 76(3)(a) of the ELRA and requests the Government to provide information on any progress made thereon in its next report.

Public sector. In its previous observation, the Committee had requested the Government to modify the draft Public Service (Negotiating Machinery) Bill so as to ensure that restrictions on the right to strike in the public sector were limited to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that section 26(1) of the 2003 Act of the Parliament No. 19 (Public Service (Negotiating Machinery)) stipulates that "any public servant" may take part in a strike or lockout in the case of a subsisting dispute or complaint. The Committee further notes that section 26(2) provides, as conditions to be satisfied to take part in a strike, that: (i) a ballot strike has to be conducted under the supervision of the labour officer and the majority of the public servants of the respective service scheme has to support the strike; and (ii) a 60 days' notice has to be served to the Government counting from the date on which the ballot was cast. The Committee considers that the supervision by the administrative authority of the strike ballot constitutes an act of interference in trade union activities; that the requirement of a decision of the majority of the public servants of the respective service scheme for the calling of a strike is excessive and could unnecessarily hinder the possibility of carrying out a strike; that if the legislation requires a vote by workers before a strike can be held, it should ensure that account is taken only of the votes cast (General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 170). The Committee considers that the 60 days' notice could constitute an obstacle to collective bargaining. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 26(2)(d) of the Act No. 19 in accordance with the abovementioned principles, and to provide information thereon in its next report.

Finally, the Committee notes that the Government indicates that there is no service that has been designated as essential by the Essential Services Committee pursuant to section 77 of the ELRA. The Committee recalls that essential services should be defined in the strict sense of the term that is services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 159). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that account will be taken of this principle when establishing the list of essential services referred to by section 77 of the ELRA, and to provide information on any developments in this respect in its next report.

Zanzibar

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish organizations. In its previous observation, the Committee had requested the Government to review and amend section 2(2) of Labour Relations Act No. 1 of 2005 (LRA), which excluded the following categories of employee from the LRA's provisions: (a) judges and all judiciary officers; (b) members of special departments; and (c) employees of the House of Representatives. Noting the Government's indication in its report that the amendment of section 2(2) of the LRA is not yet done, the Committee once again recalls that the only admissible exceptions to the right to organize are those explicitly provided for under Article 9 of the Convention (i.e. the armed forces and the police) and that other categories of workers, without distinction whatsoever, should enjoy the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 2(2) of the LRA in accordance with this provision and to provide information thereon in its next report.

Right of workers and employers to establish organizations without previous authorization. The Committee had previously requested the Government to provide further information on section 21(1)(c) of the LRA, particularly on the criteria employed by the registrar for determining whether an organization's constitution contains suitable provisions to protect its members' interests, and on the expeditiousness of the registration procedure, including the average time period, from the submission to the application, for an organization to be registered. The Committee had recalled that the competent authority must not be given discretionary power to refuse registration, as it could amount in practice to a system of previous authorization, contrary to the principles of the Convention. The Committee had also recalled that the registration procedure must not be too long and complicated, so as to comply with the Convention (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 73–75). The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the rules and regulations for the implementation of the Act will take into account the concerns raised by the Committee. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the said rules and regulations once adopted and to provide information thereon in its next report.

Article 3. Right of organizations to organize their administration and activities and to formulate their programmes. In its previous observation, the Committee had noted that the Government indicated that section 42 of the LRA forbids the union to use, directly or indirectly, its funds to pay any fines or penalties incurred by a trade union official in the discharge of his or her duties on behalf of the organization. The Committee had recalled that trade unions should have the power to manage their funds without undue restrictions from the legislation (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 124). The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that this provision does not apply to fines or penalties imposed upon the union itself and that the objective pursued by this section was to prevent embezzlement and fraudulent use of trade unions' funds by individuals. The Government's report adds that this section will be reviewed and that consultations will be held in line with the concerns raised by the Committee. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made thereon in its next report.

Political activities. In its previous observation, the Committee had requested the Government to provide information on the definition of political affiliation under section 8(2) of the LRA, and to indicate in particular whether under this provision trade unions may still pursue certain political activities, including the expression of opinions on economic and social policy. The Committee takes due note of the Government's indication that while section 8(2) of the LRA forbids trade unions from being affiliated to political parties, all citizens under the 1984 Zanzibar Constitution – including trade unions' members and the unions themselves – enjoy the right to express their opinions on any matter, be it social, economic and political, without any intimidation.

The right to strike. In its previous observation, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 64(1) of the LRA, which sets forth categories of employees – namely: (a) employees of any public authority who are actually engaged in the management of such authority; and (b) employees actually engaged in the management of a business of the employer for which such an employee is engaged – that may not participate in a strike, without any additional indication, and section 64(2) of the LRA, which lists several services that are deemed essential, including sanitation services, and in which strikes are forbidden. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that section 64(1) (a) and (b) was meant to enable people in the managerial cadre to have an opportunity to resolve strikes, but that the comments of the Committee will be taken into account. The Committee recalls that the prohibition of the right to strike in the public service should be limited to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or in essential services in the strict sense of the term, i.e. services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population, or in the case of an acute national crisis. The Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures to amend sections 64(1) and 64(2) of the LRA in accordance with this principle and requests it to provide information on any progress made thereon in its next report.

Protests. Previously, the Committee had requested the Government to amend sections 63(2)(b) and 69(2) of the LRA, which determine that before resorting to protest action, the trade union must give the mediation authority at least 30 days to resolve it and subsequently give 14 days' advance notice explaining the purpose, nature and place and date of the protest action; it had requested the Government to shorten this 44-day period (to a maximum of 30 days, for example).

The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the amendments of sections 63(2)(b) and 69(2) of the LRA are not yet done. The Committee once again recalls that the period of advance notice should not be an additional obstacle to bargaining, with workers in practice simply waiting for its expiry in order to be able to exercise their right to strike (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 172). The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to amend sections 63(2)(b) and 69(2) of the LRA in the near future in accordance with the abovementioned principle, and to provide information on any progress made thereon in its next report.

Finally, in its previous observation, the Committee had regretted that the Government did not provide information about section 41(2)(j) of the LRA, which concerns restrictions on the use of trade unions' funds and had requested it to take the necessary steps to amend section 41(2)(j) of the LRA so that the institutions a trade union may wish to contribute to are not subject to the Registrar's approval. The Committee notes that the Government refers in this respect to its comments under Article 3 concerning the use of trade unions' funds (see above). In these circumstances, the Committee reiterates its request to the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 41(2)(j) in light of the principles referred to above and to provide information thereon in its next report.

Expressing the hope that the Government will make every effort to bring its legislation into full conformity with the Convention, the Committee welcomes the Government's request for technical assistance and hopes that it will be provided as soon as possible.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 24 August 2010. The Committee also notes the Government's reply to the allegation made by the ITUC in a communication dated 26 August 2009 that collective agreements must be submitted to the Industrial Court for approval and may be refused registration if they do not conform to the Government's economic policy. The Government indicates in its report that section 71(1) of the Employment and Labour Relations Act (ELRA) provides that a collective agreement shall be in writing, signed by the parties and binding on the last signatures, and that the parties are not bound to submit it for approval to a court.

Furthermore, the Committee notes the Government's replies to the points raised by the Committee in its previous observation concerning the 2003 Public Service (Negotiating Machinery) Act, in particular:

- (i) As regards the scope of application of the Act, the Government indicates in its report that the Act does not cover all civil servants, but covers teachers, servants of the health sector, and servants of the local and central Government and excludes employees of the prison service and national service. The Committee recalls that all public servants, with the sole possible exception of those engaged in the administration of the State, in the armed forces and the police, should enjoy the right to collective bargaining with respect to salaries and other conditions of employment (General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraphs 199 and 262). The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the types of workers included in the national service and to take the necessary measures to ensure to prison staff the rights enshrined in the Convention.
- (ii) As regards the protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference, the Government indicates in its report that section 29 of the Act prohibits acts of discrimination against any public servant who takes part in a strike or lock-out, or is a leader or activist of a trade union which inspired or incited public servants to take part in a strike or lock-out. The Committee recalls that Article 1 of the Convention guarantees workers adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination in taking up employment and in the course of employment including at the time of termination, and covers all measures of anti-union discrimination (dismissals, transfers, demotions and any other prejudicial acts) – i.e. not only acts of anti-union discrimination related to strikes and lock-outs – and that legal provisions prohibiting acts of anti-union discrimination shall be accompanied by effective and rapid procedures to ensure their application in practice. Furthermore, the Committee recalls that legislation should explicitly prohibit all acts of interference and make express provision for rapid appeals procedures, coupled with effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against such acts, in order to ensure the application in practice of Article 2 (General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 214, 223 and 232). The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the measures taken or contemplated to include in the legislation adequate protection against all acts of anti-union discrimination and acts of interference, as well as sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against such acts, in accordance with the abovementioned principles.
- (iii) As regards the subjects that may be negotiated under the Act, the Government indicates in its report that these relate to the terms and conditions of employment, including wages.
- (iv) As regards the duration of the collective agreements provided for in the Act, the Government indicates in its report that section 17(5) of the Act provides that every award made shall be final and binding upon the Government and the public servants to whom the agreement relates for a period of 12 months beginning on the date on which the award was made.

- (v) As regards the cases in which compulsory arbitration may be imposed under the Act, the Government indicates in its report that the functions of the Service Joint Staff Council include to negotiate on matters relating to the terms and conditions of service with respect to the public servants generally or to the service scheme to which that Service Joint Council belongs; that pursuant to section 8(1), all decisions on any matter which is subject of consideration and determination by the Service Joint Staff Council shall be referred to the Public Service Joint Staff Council for endorsement; that pursuant to sections 17–19, an agreement reached by the Public Service Joint Staff Council or any matter referred to it by the Service Joint Staff Council for approval in relation to any dispute regarding terms and conditions of service of public servants shall be forwarded to the minister; that the matters forwarded to the minister are for award making and in case upon finding that the Public Service Joint Staff Council was unable to reach an agreement, the Minister may refer the dispute to the court. The Committee recalls that compulsory arbitration in the framework of collective bargaining is only acceptable if it is at the request of both parties involved, or in the case of the public service, or in essential services in the strict sense of the term, namely those services whose interruption would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population. In light of the above, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend sections 17 and 18 of the Public Service (Negotiating Machinery) Act, so as to ensure their full conformity with the abovementioned principles, and to provide information on any developments in this respect in its next report.
- (vi) As regards to the question whether all individual public services have the right to conclude collective agreements, the Government indicates in its report that section 4 of the Act provides that a Service Joint Staff Council shall be established for each of the following services: civil service, teachers service, local government, health service and fire and rescue services and immigration service; that according to section 6, the functions of the Service Joint Staff Council shall be, inter alia, to negotiate on matters relating to the terms and conditions of service with respect to the public servants generally or to the Service Scheme to which that Council belongs.

Article 4 of the Convention. Trade union recognition for purposes of collective bargaining. In its previous observation, the Committee had requested the Government to amend section 57(2) of the Labour Relations Act of 2005 (LRA), which provides that in order to be designated as representative – and thus be accorded exclusive bargaining agent status – the union concerned must be registered and represent “the majority of employees at the appropriate bargaining level”, which corresponds in fact to 50 per cent of the members of a bargaining unit. While noting once again the Government’s indication that the Committee’s comments have been noted, the Committee recalls that such a system denies the possibility of bargaining to a majority union which fails to secure this absolute majority (General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 241). The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures, in the very near future, to amend section 57(2) of the LRA so that if no union covers more than 50 per cent of the workers, the minority unions in the bargaining unit are not denied collective bargaining rights, at least on behalf of their members, and to provide information thereon in its next report. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate whether, in practice, minority unions enjoy collective bargaining rights in cases where there is no union representing 50 per cent of the workers concerned. If this is the case, the Committee requests the Government to provide relevant examples and statistics.

Furthermore, the Committee had requested the Government to provide full information on the procedures and criteria by which the disputes resolution authority, in cases brought before it under section 57(4) of the LRA, determines representative trade union status when there is an objection from another trade union or when the employer does not recognize the trade union. Noting the Government’s statement that the rules and regulations for the implementation of the Act are not yet finalized, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures, in the very near future, to ensure that the rules and regulations will provide for objective procedures and criteria for the determination of representative trade union status and to provide a copy of the said rules and regulations once finalized, as well as information thereon in its next report.

Article 6. Public servants. The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend section 54(2)(b) of the LRA, so as to guarantee to managerial employees the right to bargain collectively, and to indicate the categories of employees excluded from the right to bargain collectively by the minister under section 54(2)(c) of the LRA. The Committee recalls that all public servants, with the sole possible exception of those engaged in the administration of the State, the armed forces and the police, should enjoy the right to collective bargaining with respect to salaries and other conditions of employment. Noting once again the Government’s statement that the rules and regulations referred to above will address this matter, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures, in the very near future, to amend section 54(2)(b) of the LRA so as to guarantee to managerial employees the right to bargain collectively, and to indicate the categories of employees excluded from the right to bargain collectively under section 54(2)(c).

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1991)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 24 August 2010 concerning issues already raised by the Committee, and the Government's reply thereon.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that, within the process of harmonization of its labour legislation with that of the European Union, and in accordance with the recommendations of the International Labour Organization, it has made significant changes and amendments to the Law on Labour Relations. The Committee welcomes the laws changing and amending the Law on Labour Relations (Official Gazette, No. 106/2008 and No. 130/2009). More particularly, the Committee notes with satisfaction that:

- Section 236(5) of the Labour Relations Act which provided that workers had to specify the duration of a strike has been repealed by article 23 of the Law changing and amending the Labour Relations Act (No. 106/2008) and that no provision requires the workers and their organizations to specify the duration of the strike.
- Section 201(2) of the Labour Relations Act which stated that a trade union or an employers' association shall terminate its activities if, without any important and justified reasons, it did not hold a meeting of its highest executive body for a period exceeding twice the period provided for in its statutes has been amended by the law changing and amending the Labour Relations Act (No. 130/2009) and now provides that the trade union or employers' associations shall cease to operate only if such is decided by the competent body of the trade union or employers' association, which by statute is authorized to decide on the termination of operation of the trade union or employers' association.
- Section 194, paragraph 4, which provided that if a trade union or an employer's association ceases its activity, its property may not be divided among its members has been repealed by the law changing and amending the Labour Relations Act, No. 130/2009.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1991)

Article 4 of the Convention. Collective bargaining. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary steps to amend sections 212, 213 and 219 of the Labour Relations Law (2005) so as to: (i) lower the 33 per cent representation requirement imposed on trade unions and employers (or their organizations) for collective bargaining purposes at all levels; (ii) adopt legislative provisions regulating the procedure for determining the most representative organization, based on objective and pre-established criteria; and (iii) adopt legislative provisions regulating the procedure for establishing the negotiation board (the members of which are appointed by trade unions) when no trade union organization represents 33 per cent of employees or no employers' organization meets the same requirement.

In this regard, the Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that, within the process of harmonization of its labour legislation with that of the European Union, and in accordance with the recommendations of the ILO, it has made significant changes and amendments to the Law on Labour Relations. The Committee further notes the law changing and amending the Law on Labour Relations (Official Gazette, No. 130/2009):

(i) Representativeness of a trade union and procedure for establishing the negotiation body when no trade union organization represents 20 per cent of employees. The Committee notes that sections 211 of the Law on Labour Relations now provides that the representativeness of a trade union or an organization of employers is determined for the purposes of participation in tripartite social partnership bodies and tripartite delegations of the social partners at the national level; for the participation in the collective bargaining at the public sector level, and within the private sector, at national level, industrial level and employer level. The criteria for determining the representativeness are defined in sections 212 and 213 of the Law on Labour Relations. The Committee notes that collective bargaining is possible for the trade unions representing 20 per cent of the employees at the level it wishes to bargain, except at the state level where the trade union must represent 10 per cent of the labour force.

In addition, in its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to adopt legislative provisions regulating the procedure for establishing the negotiation board (the members of which are appointed by trade unions) when no trade union organization represents 20 per cent of employees or no employers' organization meets the same requirement (sections 219 and 221 of the Law on Labour Relations). The Committee notes that no information was provided in this regard by the Government. Given that the 20 per cent threshold could be difficult to obtain in certain sectors and in large enterprises and taking into consideration the principle set out in section 4 of the Convention concerning the promotion of free and voluntary collective bargaining, the Committee requests the Government to adopt legislative provisions regulating the procedure for establishing the negotiation board (the members of which are appointed by trade unions) when no trade union organization represents 20 per cent of employees or no employers' organization meets the same requirement.

(ii) Procedure for determining the most representative organization. The Committee notes with interest that new articles laying down the procedure and the competent body establishing the representativeness have been added to the Law on Labour Relations: Body competent for Establishment of Representativeness (213-a); Composition and manner of operation of the Commission (213-b; tripartite); Application for establishment of representativeness (213-c); Procedure upon application and appeal (213-d); Re-assessment of the representativeness (213-e); and Publication of the decision (213-f). The Committee further notes that the mode of operation of the Commission is laid down by the Rules of Procedures of the Commission. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the Rules of Procedures of the Commission with its next report.

As concerns the application for establishment of representativeness, the Committee notes that section 213-c provides that the application to the Commission for establishment of representativeness to bargain collectively shall be filed by a trade union at a higher level. The Committee recalls that the determination of the bargaining level is essentially a matter to be left to the discretion of the parties and, consequently, the level of negotiation should not be imposed by law. The Committee requests the Government to indicate if section 213-c allows trade unions at enterprise level or industry level to apply for the establishment of representativeness.

The Committee also notes that section 205 of Law on Labour Relations, as amended by law changing and amending Law on Labour Relations (Official Gazette, No. 130/2009) provides that General Collective Agreement in the private sector (area of the economy) and public sector shall apply directly and are mandatory for the employers and employees of the respective sectors. The Committee requests the Government to clarify, in its next report, if the General Collective Agreement for economy and the General Collective Agreement for public sector can only be concluded by the most representative trade union organizations at the state level.

Comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the Federation of Trade Unions of Macedonia (CCM). The Committee notes the comments made by the ITUC in a communication dated 24 August 2010. These comments concern problems already examined by the Committee. The Committee also notes the comments made by the CCM in a communication dated 2 October 2008 concerning the lack of social dialogue that occurred during the process of the labour law reform. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the observations made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 26 August 2009, and the observations of the ITUC dated 24 August 2010.

Article 2 of the Convention. Export processing zones. The Committee recalls that for a number of years it has been requesting the Government to recognize the trade union rights of workers in export processing zones. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that no provisions of the specific texts respecting processing zones exclude the application of the provisions of the Labour Code (Act No. 2006-010 of 13 December 2006) and that all workers in enterprises approved with the status of processing zones benefit from the guarantees afforded by the Labour Code. The Committee also notes with interest the Government's indication in its report that trade union organizations for workers in processing zones were created in 2009 and 2010 (the Trade Union Federation of Workers in Export Processing Zones (USYNTRAZOF), the National Union of Workers in Processing Zones of Togo (SYNATRAZOFT) and the Free Trade Union of Workers in Processing Zones of Togo (SYLITRAZOF)) and that, for the purposes of clarification, including the extent of trade union freedoms, the Government has decided, with the support of the International Labour Office, to undertake the revision of Act No. 89-14 of 18 September 1989 establishing the rules governing processing zones and subsequent texts. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the progress achieved in relation to the revision of the Act, and to provide a copy of such instrument with its next report. It recalls the importance that it attaches to the value of the consultation of employers' and workers' organizations in the preparation and implementation of legislation affecting their interests.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the observations of 2006, 2008 and 2009 of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC). The Committee also notes the communication from the ITUC dated 24 August 2010.

Article 1 of the Convention. Export processing zones. With regard to the difference in the protection against anti-union discrimination, alleged by the ITUC in its 2009 comments, between workers in export processing zones and other workers, the Committee refers to its comments on the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

Article 4. Measures to encourage and promote the development of voluntary negotiation between employers' and workers' organizations. In its previous observation, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the exercise of collective bargaining in practice. The Committee notes that, in its comments dated 26 August 2009, the ITUC indicates in this respect that, while the right to collective bargaining exists, it is limited to a single agreement that has to be negotiated at the national level and obtain the approval of the Government representatives and of trade unions and employers. The ITUC adds that the agreement establishes the national wage standards for all employees in the formal sector. The Committee notes the Government's emphasis in its report that employers' and workers' organizations negotiate freely their conditions of work without any interference by the public authorities and that, in addition to the tripartite protocol agreement referred to by the ITUC, several collective agreements have been concluded in the various sectors. The Committee notes the Government's indication that certain of these agreements were renegotiated by the social partners in 2008 and 2009, in fields such as banking, insurance, telecommunications and the oil sector, and that collective agreements are also currently being negotiated in sectors which are not yet covered by them, such as lay and religious private teaching, private health institutions and the mining industry. The Committee also notes the Government's indication in its report that the renegotiation by the social partners of the inter-occupational collective agreement (dating from the 1970s), with the support of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) was also planned in July 2010. The Committee recalls that the right to negotiate freely with employers concerning conditions of work is an essential element of freedom of association and that the promotion of collective bargaining is applicable in both the private sector and in nationalized enterprises and public institutions. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report concerning:

- the number of collective agreements concluded, their coverage and the action taken as a result;
- the exercise of collective bargaining in practice (the number of workers and sectors covered, including the public service); and
- the measures taken by the authorities to promote collective bargaining (publications, seminars and other activities).

In particular, the Committee requests the Government to provide information with its next report on the renegotiation, with the support of the UNDP of the inter-occupational collective agreement dating from the 1970s.

Section 260 of the Labour Code. In a previous direct request, the Committee noted that, under the terms of section 260 of the Labour Code, in the event of persistent disagreement between the parties to collective bargaining on certain points in a collective dispute, the Minister of Labour may submit the matter to an arbitration board following the failure of conciliation and that, according to the Government, this consists of purely judicial arbitration that is envisaged following the exhaustion of all other means. The Committee wishes to draw the Government's attention to the fact that section 260 of the Labour Code, which provides for arbitration imposed by the authorities, without the parties to the dispute requesting it, is contrary to the principle of the autonomy of the parties and the principle of free and voluntary negotiation envisaged in the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take measures to amend the legislation with a view to providing that compulsory arbitration is only possible at the request of the two parties to the dispute or in the context of disputes relating to essential services in the strict sense of the term or, in the public service, in the case of public servants exercising authority in the name of the State.

Trinidad and Tobago

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee has been referring for a number of years to the need to amend various sections of the Industrial Relations Act (IRA), as amended, so as to: (i) enable a simple majority of the workers in a bargaining unit (excluding those workers not taking part in the vote) to call a strike (section 59(4)(a)); (ii) ensure that any recourse to the courts by the Ministry of Labour, or by one party only, to end a strike is limited to cases of strikes in essential services in the strict sense of the term (sections 61 and 65); (iii) ensure that prohibition of industrial action in essential services is limited to cases of strikes in essential services in the strict sense of the term (section 67); and (iv) repeal the prohibition of industrial action, under penalty of 18 months' imprisonment, for the teaching service and employees of the Central Bank (section 69).

The Committee had noted that the Government had indicated that the Ministry of Labour and Small and Micro-Enterprise Development has engaged in an exercise of strategic planning to achieve the goals of the country's "Developmental plan, vision 2020" which recognizes that decent work is central for the social and economic development of the country. In this regard, matters related to freedom of association and the right of workers to organize are accorded high priority. Diverse mechanisms and measures to promote and protect the freedom of association and the right to organize have been adopted, in particular: (i) integration of labour issues in policies and programmes at national, sectoral, enterprise and industry levels; (ii) review of labour legislation; and (iii) effective dialogue with social partners. With respect to the amendment of the IRA, the Government further indicated that the Standing Tripartite Committee on Labour Matters, which consults and advises on proposed labour legislation, has not been reconstituted since its term expired in December 2006. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that from and since the last report, there have not been any amendments to the IRA. However, the IRA has been included in the Ministry of Labour and Small and Micro Enterprise Development's Legislative Review Programme for the period 2010–11 and it is anticipated that amendments to the sections listed by the Committee will be addressed within this programme.

In these circumstances, the Committee hopes that concrete measures will be taken in the near future to amend the legislation so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention. The Committee expects the Government to communicate progress on these issues in its next report and recalls that it can avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office.

ITUC comments. The Committee notes the comments from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 24 August 2010 which refer to issues already raised by the Committee, as well as: (i) acts of repression against demonstrators and the detention of a trade union leader; and (ii) the exclusion of the right to legally join trade unions to certain categories of workers under the law (e.g. domestic workers, drivers, gardeners). The Committee requests the Government to provide its observation thereon as well as on the comments submitted by ITUC in 2008.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. The Committee hopes that the Government's report will be supplied for examination by the Committee at its next session and that it will contain full information on the matters raised in its previous observation, which read as follows:

Article 4 of the Convention. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee has been referring for a number of years to the need to amend section 24(3) of the Civil Service Act that affords a privileged position to already registered associations, without providing objective and pre-established criteria for determining the most representative association in the civil service. The Committee had noted that the Government indicates in its report that the Civil Service Act review has been in progress but is not yet complete. However, after consultation with the employers' and workers' representative organizations, the Government considers that the amendment of section 24(3) is not possible at this time because the presence of more than one association representing the seven existing classes in the civil service for the purposes of consultations and negotiation could place the employer in a difficult position. The Committee had recalled, however, that where there exists a trade union which enjoys preferential or exclusive bargaining rights, as in the current system, decisions concerning the most representative organization should be made by virtue of objective and pre-established criteria instead of simply giving priority to the one which was registered earlier in time, so as to avoid any opportunities for partiality or abuse. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the legislation will be modified in the near future, including section 24(3), so as to bring it into conformity with the principles of the Convention, and requests the Government to indicate any developments thereon.

Promotion of collective bargaining. In its previous comments, the Committee referred to the need to amend section 34 of the Industrial Relations Act in order to ensure that, in cases in which no trade union represents the majority of workers, the minority unions can negotiate jointly a collective agreement applicable in the negotiating unit, or at least conclude a collective agreement on behalf of their own members. The Committee had noted that the Government reiterates that the Standing Tripartite Committee on Labour Matters (a consultative body) has not been reconstituted after the expiration of its term in December 2006. The Committee expresses the hope that concrete measures will be taken in the near future to amend the legislation so as to allow minority unions in the unit to bargain collectively, at least on behalf of their own members when there is no union that represents the majority of the workers. The Committee trusts that the Government will communicate progress on these issues in its next report and recalls that it can avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office.

ITUC comments. The Committee notes the comments from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 24 August 2010 indicating that: (i) although the law states that workers can form and join trade unions, in practice, everyone working in "essential services", which include domestic workers, drivers, gardeners and others, are not recognized as workers under the law and therefore cannot legally join trade unions; (ii) many unions had their collective bargaining blocked by employers' delaying tactics; and (iii) the state authorities have repeatedly refused to negotiate collective agreements with the public sector unions. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observation thereon.

Tunisia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee noted the observations concerning harassment and intimidation of members of the Tunisian Magistrates' Association (AMT). The Committee noted that the Government had not provided information concerning the situation of the AMT. It recalls that the standards set out in the Convention apply to magistrates, who should be able to establish organizations of their own choosing to further and defend the interests of their members. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the manner in which it ensures that magistrates enjoy the guarantees afforded by the Convention.

With regard to the observations concerning the recognition of a union of university teaching staff, the Government indicates that it has always given priority to dialogue and adds that certain unions covering higher education personnel have encountered internal organizational problems, and refers in this respect to the establishment of a General Federation of Higher Education and Scientific Research (FGESRS), which was challenged in the courts by first-level unions, which in turn founded an independent union. The Committee further notes that, in its reply in November 2008, the Government denies any discrimination against teaching personnel on grounds of their trade union membership and activities. Finally, the Government indicated that the FGESRS had been constantly present in the delegation of the UGTT for the negotiation of its claims with the Government in 2007 and 2008. The Committee further noted the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee of Freedom of Association concerning a complaint presented by the above Federation (see Case No. 2592, 350th Report). The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any development relating to the determination of the representativeness of trade union organizations in the higher education sector.

With regard to the refusal to recognize a new trade union confederation, namely the Tunisian General Confederation of Labour (CGTT), the Committee noted the Government's reply, in which it confined itself to recalling that the formalities of depositing the statutes of a trade union organization are carried out without the intervention of the Ministry of the Interior and accordingly rebuts the ITUC's comments. The Committee trusts that, in so far as the formalities required by the law are fulfilled, there will be a favourable and expeditious response to the request for the registration of the CGTT.

Legislative changes. The Committee recalled that for many years it has been making comments concerning provisions of the Labour Code that are not in conformity with the Convention. The Committee noted in this respect that, in its brief report, the Government indicated that the possibility is being examined of bringing the provisions upon which the Committee had commented into conformity. The Committee recalls that these provisions relate to the following points.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. Section 242 of the Labour Code. The Committee recalls that the minimum age for joining a trade union should be the same as the age for admission to employment as determined in the Labour Code (16 years in accordance with section 53 of the Labour Code) and that there should be no requirement for authorization by parents or guardians. It requests the Government to amend section 242 of the Labour Code to that effect.

Article 3. Right of organizations to elect their representatives in full freedom. Section 251 of the Labour Code. With regard to this provision, under which foreign nationals may have access to administrative or executive posts in a trade union provided that they have obtained the approval of the Secretary of State for Youth, Sport and Social Affairs, the Committee recalls that the imposition of such conditions on foreign nationals amounts to interference by the public authorities in the internal affairs of a trade union, which is inconsistent with Article 3 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to amend section 251 of the Labour Code so as to ensure that workers' organizations have the right to elect their representatives in full freedom, including from among foreign workers, at least after a reasonable period of residence in the country.

Article 3. Right of workers' organizations to organize their activities and formulate their programmes in full freedom. (a) Section 376bis(2) of the Labour Code. The Committee has been recalling for many years that the requirement for a first-level union to obtain the approval of the central workers' confederation before declaring a strike, under the terms of section 376bis(2) of the Labour Code, is inconsistent with the Convention. The Committee emphasizes that a legislative provision which requires the prior approval of the trade union confederation for a strike is an impediment to the freedom of choice of first-level organizations to exercise the right to strike. Such a restriction could only be envisaged if it is included voluntarily in the statutes of the trade unions concerned, and not imposed by law. The Committee requests the Government to repeal subsection 2 of section 376bis of the Labour Code so as to guarantee that workers' organizations, irrespective of their level, can organize their activities in full freedom with a view to furthering and defending the interests of their members, in accordance with Article 3 of the Convention.

(b) Section 376ter of the Labour Code. With regard to this provision, which requires the strike notification to provide an indication of the duration of the strike, the Committee requests the Government to amend section 376ter of the Labour Code so as to remove any legal requirement to specify the duration of a strike and to guarantee that workers' organizations can call a strike of unlimited duration if they so wish.

(c) Section 381ter of the Labour Code. With regard to essential services, the list of which is determined by decree under the terms of section 381ter of the Labour Code, the Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the decree in question has been adopted and, if so, to provide the list of essential services as determined.

(d) Sections 387 and 388 of the Labour Code. In its previous observations, the Committee criticized the following provisions: (a) the imposition of the penalties established by section 388 of the Labour Code, under which any person who has participated in an unlawful strike is liable to a sentence of imprisonment of from three to eight months and a fine of from 100 to 500 dinars, depends on the assessment by the criminal court of the gravity of the offences concerned; (b) section 387 of the Labour Code, according to which any strike called in breach of the provisions on conciliation and mediation, notice and mandatory approval by the central organization (this point relating to section 376bis of the Labour Code is also the subject of comments by the Committee) shall be deemed unlawful; and (c) section 53 of the Penal Code, under which the courts can impose a lesser penalty than the minimum established in section 388, or commute a prison sentence to a fine. The Committee recalls that no penal sanction should be imposed against a worker for having carried out a peaceful strike and, therefore, measures of imprisonment should not be imposed on any account. Such sanctions could be envisaged only where during a strike, violence against persons or property or other serious infringements of rights have been committed, and can be imposed pursuant to legislation punishing such acts. Nevertheless, even in the absence of violence, if the strike modalities had the effect of making the strike illegitimate, proportionate disciplinary sanctions may be imposed against strikers. The Committee requests the Government to amend sections 387–388 of the Labour Code taking into account the abovementioned principle.

Recalling that its comments have been made for many years, the Committee trusts that the Government's next report will indicate significant progress in bringing the Labour Code into conformity with the requirements of the Convention. It also recalls that the Government can request the Office's technical assistance on these matters.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Finally, the Committee notes the comments of the ITUC, dated 24 August 2010, concerning the application of the Convention, in particular, serious allegations of anti-union attacks. The Committee recalls that freedom of association can only be exercised in conditions in which fundamental human rights are truly respected and guaranteed. The Committee regrets that the Government has not responded to these allegations despite the seriousness and requests the Government to provide its observations in this respect.

Turkey

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 24 August 2010, by the Confederation of Public Employees' Trade Unions (KESK) in a communication dated 28 August 2010 and by Education International (EI) in a communication dated 30 August 2010 and the Independent Confederation of Public Servants' Trade Unions (BASK) in a communication dated 11 October 2010. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon in its next report.

The Committee notes the discussion that took place in the 2010 Conference Committee on the Application of Standards. It further notes that an ILO high-level bipartite mission visited the country in March 2010 pursuant to a request by the Conference Committee in 2009.

Civil liberties

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments previously made by the ITUC on the excessive force used by the police during public demonstrations. The Government indicates, in particular, that measures were put into effect in 2009 to prevent the use of excessive force by the police. Police officers responsible for the security of public marches and demonstrations began to receive training on the proportional use of force. About 17,000 police officers will be trained annually. The Government further indicates that, after the promulgation of May Day as Labour and Solidarity Day in 2008 and official holiday in 2009, May Day was celebrated in 2010 in Taksim square in Istanbul for the first time since its closure for meetings and demonstrations three decades ago. According to the Government, the demonstration was peaceful due to the constructive collaboration between trade unions and the security forces.

With regard to the 2007 ITUC allegation that trade unions must allow the police to attend their meetings and record the proceedings, the Government points out that, according to the Associations Act, the security forces are not authorized to enter trade union premises unless a court order is obtained on the grounds of the need to maintain public order and prevent the occurrence of criminal incidences. It further points out that a distinction between public meetings and meetings at trade union premises should be made and that any attendance at trade union public meetings by the police is entirely related to the need to maintain public order.

Regarding the setting on fire of the premises of Egitim-Sen's branch office, the Government indicates that the security forces and the fire brigades intervened on time, three suspects were arrested and one of them was sentenced to three years of imprisonment. No trade union member was harmed.

While taking due note of the information provided by the Government on the steps taken to avoid police violence and undue interference, the Committee observes with concern the allegations of important restrictions placed on freedom of speech and assembly of trade unionists, contained in the above-noted communications from the ITUC, KESK and EI. The Committee, like the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, urges the Government to continue to take all the necessary measures to ensure a climate free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind so that workers and employers could fully and freely exercise their rights under the Convention. The Committee also urges the Government to review, in full consultation with the social partners, any legislation that might have been applied in practice in a manner contrary to this fundamental principle and to consider any necessary amendments or abrogation. It requests the Government to indicate in its next report all measures taken in this respect. The Committee also requests the Government to carry out an investigation on the allegations concerning all the cases of use of violence during police or other security force interventions and to provide information on the outcome with its next report.

Legislative issues

The Committee recalls that for a number of years it has been commenting on several provisions of Act No. 2821 on trade unions, Act No. 2822 on collective labour agreements, strikes and lockouts and Act No. 4688 on public employees' trade unions.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that Law No. 5982 amending the Constitution of the Republic of Turkey, enacted by the Grand National Assembly on 7 May 2010, entered into force after being approved by the electorate in the referendum held on 12 September 2010. The Committee notes with interest that, pursuant to this Law, the following provisions of the Constitution were repealed:

- article 51(4) prohibiting membership in more than one trade union;
- article 54(3) providing for trade union liability for any material damage caused during a strike; and
- article 54(7) prohibiting "politically motivated strikes and lockouts, solidarity strikes and lockouts, occupation of work premises, labour go-slows, and other forms of obstruction".

Regarding Act No. 4688 on public servants' trade unions, the Committee further notes the Government's explanation provided to the Conference Committee that the constitutional amendment would be followed by the relevant legislative amendments.

With regard to Acts Nos 2821 and 2822, the Committee notes the Government's indication that a draft Law on trade unions, amending both Acts, has been prepared by a "scientific committee" appointed by the Ministry in 2009. It further notes that this draft was communicated to the ILO High-level bipartite mission, as well as to the social partners in March 2010, in the framework of the Tripartite Consultation Board. The Committee notes that the provisions of the draft Law appear to address a number of the Committee's previous concerns. The Committee notes, in general, that the draft provisions concerning internal functioning of unions and their activities appear to be less detailed than corresponding provisions of Acts Nos 2821 and 2822, which previously gave rise to repeated interference by the authorities. Among other improvements, the Committee notes, in particular, that:

- the procedure for establishment of a trade union appears to be simplified (section 7);
- the notary requirement for becoming a trade union member is lifted (section 16);
- the establishment of workplace and occupation unions is allowed (section 3);
- a check-off facility is made available to all trade unions and the amount of trade union dues is to be determined by the organizations themselves (section 17);
- the citizenship requirement, as well as the requirement of being actively employed in the relevant branch of activity previously imposed on trade union founders, is abolished (section 6);
- the possibility for the Governor to appoint an observer at the general congress of a trade union is removed;
- the draft no longer provides for sanctions of imprisonment for violation of the legislation (section 35); and
- responsibility for suspending a strike lies with the court and not with the Council of Ministers (section 42).

The Committee notes, however, that the draft does not deal with all issues previously raised by the Committee and that no amendments to Act No. 4688 have been proposed further to those already considered by the Committee at its last session. It therefore once again draws the Government's attention to the need to amend its legislation so as to ensure compliance with the following Articles of the Convention.

Article 2 of the Convention

- The need to ensure that self-employed workers, homeworkers and apprentices enjoy the right to organize. In this respect, the Committee notes that section 2 of the draft Law refers to the definition of "worker" provided for in the Labour Law (No. 4857), according to which, an "employee is a real person working under an employment contract" and recalls that section 18 of Act No. 3308 (Apprenticeship and vocational training) leads to the exclusion either explicitly or in practice of these categories of workers.
- The need to guarantee the right to organize to public employees, such as senior public employees, magistrates, civilian personnel in military institutions and prison guards (section 15 of Act No. 4688).
- The need to ensure that persons who have been unemployed for over one year or those retired can retain their trade union membership, subject only to the by-laws of the relevant trade union (section 18 of the draft Law on trade unions).

Article 3. Election of representatives

- The need to ensure that the decision regarding the suspension of a trade union officer's mandate in cases where he/she becomes a candidate in local or general elections and its termination in case of election belongs to the relevant trade union (sections 22(3) and 27(3) of the draft Law on trade unions).
- The need to repeal section 10(8) of Act No. 4688, which provides for the removal of union executive bodies in case of non-respect of requirements concerning meetings and decisions of general assemblies set out in the law.
- The need to repeal section 16 of Act No. 4688 providing for a mandatory termination of trade union membership and duties by reason of resignation and exclusion from the public services or transfer to another branch of activity, so as to ensure the right of organizations to elect their representatives in full freedom.
- The need to ensure that procedures and principles related to the acquisition and termination of membership are regulated by trade unions' internal regulations or by-laws and not by the authorities (section 18(10) of the draft Law on trade unions).

Limitations on the right to strike

- The need to ensure that cases in which strikes may be restricted or even prohibited are limited to those involving: (i) public servants exercising authority in the name of the State; and (ii) essential services in the strict sense of the term, namely those services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population. With regard to the public service, the Committee recalls that section 35 of Act No. 4688, which provides for the determination and settlement of disputes by the conciliation board, makes no mention of the circumstances in which strike action may be exercised in the public service. With regard to other services, the Committee notes that, on the one hand, the draft Law on trade unions proposes to repeal sections 29–34 of Act No. 2822, which impose important limitations on the right to strike, including banning strikes in specified categories of services and, on the other, it proposes to add section 29, pursuant to which strikes may be fully or partially, permanently or temporarily prohibited by a ruling of the competent court if the strike is deemed contrary to public order or public health (section 42 of the draft Law on trade unions). The Committee considers that the term “public order” is too broad to fall within a strict definition of what may constitute an essential service.

- The need to amend section 52 of Act No. 2822, which provides for compulsory arbitration by the High Court of Arbitration at the request of one party in disputes concerning activities and establishments where strike is prohibited and where parties have failed to come to an agreement. The Committee recalls that compulsory arbitration to end a collective labour dispute and a strike is only acceptable if it is at the request of both parties involved in a dispute, or if the strike in question may be restricted, even banned, that is in the case of disputes in essential services in the strict sense of the term.
- The need to reduce the excessively long waiting period before a strike can be called (section 27 – referring to section 23 – and section 35 of Act No. 2822).
- The need to ensure that workers’ and employers’ associations are involved in the determination of minimum services and, in cases of disagreement, the question should be settled by an independent body (section 40 of Act No. 2822).
- The need to repeal severe limitations on picketing (section 48 of Act No. 2822).
- The need to ensure that no penal sanction could be imposed against a worker for having carried out a peaceful strike and that on no account measures of imprisonment could be imposed, except in cases where during a strike, violence against persons or property or other serious infringements of rights have been committed (sections 70, 71, 72, 73 (except for paragraph 3 repealed by the Constitutional Court), 77 and 79 of Act No. 2822, imposing heavy sanctions, including imprisonment for participating in unlawful strikes).

Supervision of organizations’ accounts (Associations Act No. 5253)

The Committee had previously observed that section 35 of the Associations Act of 4 November 2004 provides that certain specific sections of this Act apply to trade unions, employers’ organizations, as well as federations and confederations, if there are no specific provisions in special laws concerning these organizations. In this respect, section 19 enables the Minister of Internal Affairs or the civil administration authority to examine the books and other documents of an organization, conduct an investigation and demand information at any time, with 24 hours’ notice. Once again, the Committee recalls that the supervision of accounts should be limited to the obligation of submitting periodic financial reports or to cases where serious grounds exist for believing that the actions of an organization are contrary to its rules or the law (which should be in conformity with the Convention), or if there is a need to investigate a complaint by a certain percentage of the members of the employers’ or workers’ organizations; both the substance and the procedure of such verifications should be subject to review by the competent judicial authority affording every guarantee of impartiality and objectivity (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 125). The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated to amend sections 19 and 35 of Act No. 5253 of 2004 so as to exclude workers’ and employers’ organizations from the scope of application of these provisions or ensure that verification of trade union accounts beyond the submission of periodic financial reports takes place only where there are serious grounds for believing that the actions of an organization are contrary to its rules or the law (which should be in conformity with the Convention) or in order to investigate a complaint by a certain percentage of members.

While noting the Government’s indication that consultations with the social partners on the amendments to trade union legislation will continue until consensus is reached, the Committee regrets to observe that the Government has not provided any information with respect to the elaboration of the plan of action with clear time lines (requested by the Committee on the Application of Standards) that would allow the Committee to note significant progress in bringing the law and practice into full conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee urges the Government to engage in ongoing assistance with the ILO in order to ensure the rapid adoption of the necessary amendments to Acts Nos 2821, 2822, 4688 and 5253 and expresses the hope that the final texts will take fully into account its comments above.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1952)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 24 August 2010, by the Confederation of Public Employees’ Trade Unions (KESK) in communications dated 20 August 2009 and 28 August 2010, and by the Turkish Public Workers Labour Union (TÜRKIYE KAMU-SEN) in a communication dated 15 September 2009. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon in its next report.

While the Committee notes the observations provided by the Government on the comments made by the ITUC in a communication dated 29 August 2008, it regrets that no observations have been provided by the Government on the comments previously made by KESK in a communication dated 1 September 2008, and by DISK in a communication dated 2 September 2008. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

The Committee notes that the Government’s report on the application of the Convention has not been received.

The Committee notes that an ILO high-level bipartite mission visited the country in March 2010 pursuant to a request by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in 2009. The Committee further notes the draft Law on Trade Unions amending Acts Nos 2821 and 2822, prepared by a “scientific committee” appointed by the Ministry in 2009.

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee recalls that in its previous observation, while taking due note of legislative provisions introducing dissuasive sanctions against acts of anti-union discrimination (sections 118 and 135 of the Penal Code No. 5237, and section 18(2) of Act No. 4688), it observed that the ITUC referred to the widespread incidences of acts of anti-union discrimination in the public and private sectors, such as transfers of public employees who are trade union members or officers, interference in the activities of public sector trade unions by the Government as employer, and blacklisting and pressure to quit the union in the private sector. The Committee notes with concern that similar allegations were submitted by KESK in its communications. In view of the absence of the Government’s reply thereon or any other information provided by the Government in this respect, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the procedure that applies for the examination of complaints of anti-union discrimination in the public sector and to provide statistical data showing progress made in addressing effectively allegations of acts of anti-union discrimination and interference both in the public and private sectors (number of cases brought to the competent bodies, average duration of proceedings and remedies imposed). The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take all necessary measures to ensure that the provisions of the Convention in this regard are applied both in law and in practice.

The Committee had previously requested the Government to update the sanctions provided for under sections 59(2) (non-reinstatement of trade union officers) and 59(3) (anti-union discrimination at the time of recruitment) of Act No. 2821 and to ensure that the compensation afforded to a trade union officer who wishes to return to his/her post and is not reinstated for anti-union reasons has a dissuasive effect. The Committee notes in this respect that section 24 of the draft Law on Trade Unions would appear to address the issue previously raised by the Committee with regard to adequate compensation for acts of anti-union discrimination as it proposes to provide, in addition to the compensation provided for under the Labour Law (No. 4857), for a compensation of not less than the worker’s annual wage. With regard to the non-reinstatement of a trade union officer who wishes to return to his/her post, section 22 of the draft merely indicates that, while calculating the compensation, the employment period in the workplace shall be taken into consideration, as well as the wage and other rights enjoyed by the worker prior to termination. The Committee considers that compensation established solely pursuant to this criterion would not constitute a sufficiently dissuasive sanction against an employer. The Committee therefore requests the Government to review the draft Law on Trade Unions so as to further amend the relevant sections of Act No. 2821.

Article 4. Free and voluntary collective bargaining. The Committee recalls that it has previously expressed the hope that the Government would take the necessary measures to amend section 12 of Act No. 2822 so as to ensure that, where no union meets the 50 per cent membership criterion, the existing unions at the workplace or enterprise may bargain at least on behalf of their own members regardless of whether they are affiliated to a confederation or not. The Committee notes that, while section 39 of the new draft Law on Trade Unions, amending section 12 of Act No. 2822, proposes to abolish the requirement of affiliation to a major confederation in order for a union to be able to engage in collective bargaining at the workplace level, the proposed amendment maintains the requirement that unions should represent the majority of workers in a workplace (50 per cent plus one) in order to enter into negotiations with the employer with a view to concluding a collective agreement. The Committee once again recalls that in such systems, if no single union covers more than 50 per cent of the workers, collective bargaining rights should be granted to the existing unions in the workplace, at least on behalf of their own members. The Committee therefore requests the Government to review the draft Law on Trade Unions so as to further amend section 12 of Act No. 2822.

Collective bargaining in the public service. The Committee recalls that for a number of years it has been raising the issue of collective bargaining in the public service covered by the Public Servants Trade Unions Act, No. 4688. The Committee notes that Law No. 5982 amending the Constitution, enacted by the Grand National Assembly on 7 May 2010, entered into force after being approved by the electorate in the referendum held on 12 September 2010. The Committee notes with satisfaction that pursuant to this Law, the following provisions of the Constitution were amended:

- article 53 further amended so as to add the following paragraph: “public servants and other public employees have the right to conclude collective agreements. The parties may apply to Reconciliation Board if a dispute arises during the process of collective agreement. The decisions of the Reconciliation Board shall be final and have the force of a collective agreement. The scope of and the exceptions to the right of collective agreement, the persons to benefit from and the form, procedure and entry into force of collective agreement and the extension of the provisions of collective agreement, as well as the organization and operating procedures and principles of the Reconciliation Board and other matters shall be laid down in law”;
- article 53 so as to repeal paragraph 3 which restricted autonomy of the parties in collective bargaining; and
- article 128(2) so as to provide that “the qualifications of public servants and other public employees, procedures governing their appointments, duties and powers, their rights and responsibilities, salaries and allowances, and other manners related to their status shall be regulated by law, without prejudice to provisions on collective agreement concerning financial and social rights”.

Regarding Act No. 4688, the Committee notes the Government's explanation provided to the June 2010 Conference Committee that the constitutional amendment would be followed by the relevant legislative amendments. The Committee notes that the above-noted constitutional amendments appear to address some of the issues it had previously raised in respect of Act No. 4688 and, in particular, with regard to section 28, which limited the scope of negotiations to financial questions, and section 34, which allowed the possibility of modification of collective agreements signed by the parties, by the authorities.

The Committee takes note of the Government's indication concerning the forthcoming legislative amendment of Act No. 4688 and trusts that this Act will be soon amended so as to ensure that public servants enjoy full collective bargaining rights and not just the right to hold "collective consultative talks" as currently established. The Committee trusts that the amended legislation would further address the following points it had previously raised: (i) if the legislation is to provide for the direct employer to participate in genuine negotiations with trade unions representing public servants not engaged in the administration of the State, the need to ensure that a significant role is left to collective bargaining between the parties; (ii) the need to guarantee clearly within the legislation that negotiations cover not only financial questions but also other conditions of employment; (iii) the need to clearly guarantee that the legislation does not give the authorities, in particular the Council of Ministers, the power to modify or reject collective agreements in the public sector; and (iv) the need for the parties to be able to hold full and meaningful negotiations over a period of time longer than that currently provided for (currently 15 days under section 34).

The Committee further once again recalls that an additional issue to be overcome in order to allow for free and voluntary collective bargaining in the public sector is the recognition of the right to organize to a large number of categories of public employees not engaged in the administration of the State who are excluded from this right and, therefore, from the right to be represented in negotiations (as addressed in the comments on the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87)).

The Committee urges the Government to engage in ongoing assistance with the ILO in order to ensure the rapid adoption of the necessary amendments to Acts Nos 2821, 2822 and 4688, and expresses the hope that the final texts will take fully into account its comments above. It requests the Government to transmit the relevant legislative texts or proposed drafts thereof with its next report.

Uganda

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes that, according to the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), collective bargaining in the public service sector is not allowed by the legislation. The Committee requests the Government to take measures in order to recognize the right to collective bargaining to all public employees and public servants not engaged in the administration of the State, in accordance with Article 6 of the Convention.

Article 4 of the Convention. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee noted that section 7 of the Labour Unions Act (LUA) sets forth the lawful purposes for which trade union federations may be established. The said purposes include, inter alia: the formulation of policy relating to the proper management of labour unions and the general welfare of employees; the planning and administration of workers' education programmes; and consulting on all matters relating to labour union affairs. Noting that the lawful purposes delineated under section 7 of the LUA does not include collective bargaining, the Committee recalls that the right to collective bargaining should also be granted to federations and confederations of trade unions (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 249). In this connection, the Committee requests the Government to confirm whether the right of trade union federations to engage in collective bargaining is assured, in the LUA or in other legislation.

Compulsory arbitration. The Committee noted that, under section 5(3) of the Labour Disputes (Arbitration and Settlement) Act of 2006, in cases where a labour dispute reported to a labour officer is not referred to the Industrial Court within eight weeks from the time the report is made, any of the parties or both the parties to the dispute may refer the dispute to the Industrial Court. Section 27 of the Act, the Committee further notes, empowers the minister to refer disputes to the Industrial Court where one or both parties to a dispute refuse to comply with the recommendations of the report issued by a board of inquiry. In this connection, the Committee recalls that recourse to compulsory arbitration is acceptable only for; (1) workers in essential services, in the strict sense of the term; and (2) public employees engaged in the administration of the State. Otherwise, provisions that permit the authorities to impose compulsory arbitration, or allow one party unilaterally to submit a dispute to the authorities for arbitration, run counter to the principle of the voluntary negotiation of collective agreements enshrined in Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to amend the above legislation so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Ukraine

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee notes a communication dated 24 August 2010 from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) submitting its comments on the application of the Convention and alleging, in particular, restrictions on the right to strike and a concerted campaign against the Federation of Trade Unions of Ukraine and its affiliates. The Committee takes note of the Government's observations thereon.

The Committee notes with regret that once again, the Government's report contains no information on the measures it had previously requested the Government to take so as to ensure that national legislation is in conformity with the following Articles of the Convention.

Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to:

- ensure the right of judges to establish organizations of their own choosing to further and defend the interests of their members;
- amend section 87 of the Civil Code (2003), according to which, an organization acquires its rights of legal personality from the moment of its registration, so as to eliminate the contradiction with section 16 of the Trade Unions Act, as amended in June 2003, providing that a trade union acquires the rights of a legal person from the moment of the approval of its statute and that a legalizing authority confirms the status of a trade union and no longer has a discretionary power to refuse to legalize a trade union.

Article 3. The Committee had further requested the Government to take the necessary measures to:

- repeal section 31 of the Law on employers' organizations, which provides that the bodies of the State authority shall exercise control over economic activities of employers' organizations and their associations;
- amend section 19 of the Act on the procedure for settlement of collective labour disputes, which provides that a decision to call a strike has to be supported by a majority of the workers or two-thirds of the delegates of a conference;
- indicate categories of public servants whose right to strike is restricted or prohibited; and
- provide information on the practical application of article 293 of the Penal Code, according to which, organized group actions that seriously disturb public order, or significantly disrupt operations of public transport, any enterprise, institution or organization and active participation therein, are punishable by a fine of up to 50 minimum wages or imprisonment for a term of up to six months and, in particular, in respect of an industrial action.

The Committee expresses the hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to address the issues raised by the Committee and that its next report will contain information on the progress achieved in this respect.

The Committee recalls that in its previous observation it had requested the Government to provide its observations on the comments submitted by the Confederation of Free Trade Unions of Ukraine (KVPU) on a new draft Labour Code. The KVPU considered that such legislation, if adopted, would have a negative impact on trade union activities and referred in particular to the issue of representativity. The Committee notes that the National Forum of Trade Unions of Ukraine and the KVPU submitted the same in communications dated 30 April and 8 July 2010, respectively. The Committee notes the Government's reply thereon. According to the Government, by its decision of 20 May 2008, the Supreme Rada of Ukraine instructed the Committee on Labour and Social Policy to develop further the draft in cooperation with representatives of the Cabinet of the Ministers, All-Ukrainian trade unions and All-Ukrainian employers' organizations. To that end, a working group was established on 4 June 2008. The Government also points out that as rights of trade unions are governed by the Law on Trade Unions, the draft Labour Code does not reproduce provisions on that matter. With regard to the right of agricultural workers, the Government indicates that the draft Code would regulate labour relations, including of members of agricultural farms; Law on agricultural farms regulates rights of association and other specific issues. The Committee further notes the Government's indication in its latest report that a new version of the Code was drafted taking into account ILO advice, which had been discussed by the Committee on labour and social policy and the social partners. The Committee requests the Government to provide the latest version of the draft Labour Code and encourages it to continue its cooperation with the Office in this respect and requests it to provide information on all progress made with regard to the adoption of the Labour Code.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee notes a communication dated 24 August 2010 from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) submitting its comments on the application of the Convention and alleging, in particular, acts of anti-union discrimination and interference, as well as poor enforcement of court decisions examining cases of violations of trade union rights. The Committee also notes the Government's observations thereon.

The Committee had previously noted the Government's indication that work on drafting of the new Labour Code was ongoing and requested the Government to provide information on developments in this respect. The Committee notes that the National Forum of Trade Unions of Ukraine (NFTU) and the Confederation of Free Trade Unions of Ukraine (KVPU) submitted, in communications dated 30 April and 8 July 2010, respectively, that such legislation, if adopted, would have a negative impact on trade union rights and activities. The Committee notes, in particular, the concerns raised by the KVPU with regard to the issue of representativity and collective bargaining rights. The Committee notes the Government's reply thereon. According to the Government, by its decision of 20 May 2008, the Supreme Rada of Ukraine instructed the Committee on Labour and Social Policy to develop further the draft Labour Code in cooperation with representatives of the Cabinet of the Ministers, All-Ukrainian trade unions and All-Ukrainian employers' organizations. To that end, a working group was established on 4 June 2008. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its latest report, that a new version of the Code was drafted, taking into account the ILO's advice, which had been discussed by the Committee on Labour and Social Policy and the social partners. The Government further points out that the representativity thresholds were established by the unions after several consultations. The Committee requests the Government to provide the latest version of the draft Labour Code and encourages it to continue its cooperation with the social partners and the ILO in this respect and requests it to provide information on all progress made with regard to the adoption of the Labour Code.

Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee notes that, in its communication, the ITUC refers to the 2004 Model Statutes and Internal Rules for public limited companies, which, according to the ITUC, stipulates that works councils have a mandate for collective bargaining; however, the legislation does not provide for the establishment of such councils. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

United Kingdom

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1949)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report. It further notes the detailed comments and information provided by the Trades Union Congress (TUC) in a communication dated 28 October 2010, which raised a number of issues on the application of the Convention in law and in practice that have been the subject of the Committee's comments for many years now. The Committee requests the Government to reply to these comments in its next report.

Article 3 of the Convention. Right of workers' organizations to draw up their constitutions and rules without interference by the public authorities. The Committee's previous comments concerned the right of trade unions to draw up their rules and formulate their programmes without interference from the authorities, particularly as regards the exclusion or expulsion of individuals on account of membership in an extremist political party with principles and policies wholly repugnant to the trade union. Following the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) reached in the case of Associated Society of Locomotive Engineers and Firemen (ASLEF) v. the United Kingdom (27 May 2007), which found that section 174 of the Trade Unions and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act, 1992 (TULRA) violated Article 11 of the European Convention on Human Rights on freedom of association in that it did not strike a proper balance between the rights of individual members and those of the trade union, the Government had informed the Committee that relevant amendments contained in an Employment Bill were then before the Parliament.

The Committee had also noted the detailed comments made by the TUC which set out certain reservations in respect of the proposed amendment both as regards what it saw as a degree of legal uncertainty around its meaning and the perception of excessive complexity in the new legislation. The Committee takes due note of the detailed observations made by the Government in its latest report in reply to these concerns. In particular, the Government informs that section 19 of the Employment Act of 2008 has now amended section 174 of the 1992 Act and significantly extends the scope for trade unions to exclude and expel individuals on the grounds of their political party membership. The Government states that it attempted to balance competing human rights about freedom of belief and freedom of association in its drafting of these amendments. It therefore included safeguards concerning the essential elements of natural justice, due process and transparency which aim to ensure that: (a) membership of the political party concerned is contrary to a rule or objective of the union; (b) the union has taken the decision to exclude or expel in accordance with its rules; and (c) the union has followed fair procedures when taking that decision, and the individual does not lose his livelihood or suffer other exceptional hardship for loss of union membership. As regards this last point, the Government indicates that, since "closed shop" is already unlawful in the country, a loss of union membership is very unlikely to produce hardship on this scale. As regards the TUC allegation that the complexity would lead to unjustified and vexatious litigation, the Government states that there is no evidence to support that such mischievous litigation has been indulged in since the amendments came into force in April 2009. The Government adds in this respect that a compensatory award for unlawful exclusion would only apply where the trade union refused to admit or re-admit the individual and where membership of the political party is not contrary to a rule or objective of the trade union, whereas in the Government's understanding, the rules or objectives of British trade unions often specify that membership of certain political parties, or xenophobic or racist behaviours associated with such parties, are incompatible with union membership. The Government concludes that these amendments do not breach the Convention and are necessary in a democratic society for the protection of the rights and freedom of others.

The Committee requests the Government to reply to the further concerns expressed by the TUC in its latest comments and to provide any available information on the practical application of the amendments to section 174 of the TULRA.

Immunities in respect of civil liability for strikes and other industrial action (sections 223 and 224 of the TULRA). In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that according to the TUC, due to the decentralized nature of the industrial relations system, it was essential for workers to be able to take action against employers who are easily able to undermine union action by complex corporate structures, transferring work, or hiving off companies. The Committee generally raised the need to protect the right of workers to take industrial action in relation to matters which affect them even though, in certain cases, the direct employer may not be party to the dispute, and to participate in sympathy strikes provided the initial strike they are supporting is itself lawful. The Committee takes note of the Government's reiteration that it has no plans to change the law in this area. The Committee emphasizes that the globalization of the economy and the delocalization of work centres may have a severe impact on the right of workers' organizations to organize their activities in a manner as to defend effectively their members' interests should lawful industrial action be too restrictively defined. The Committee therefore recalls that workers should be able to participate in sympathy strikes, provided the initial strike they are supporting is lawful, and to take industrial action in relation to social and economic matters which affect them and requests the Government to review sections 223 and 224 of the TULRA, in full consultation with the social partners, and to provide further information in its next report on the progress made in ensuring respect for this principle.

The Committee further recalls that, when reviewing the comments made by the British Airline Pilots' Association (BALPA), the International Transport Federation (ITF) and Unite the Union, the Committee had observed with serious concern the practical limitations on the effective exercise of the right to strike of the BALPA workers in the case at hand. The Committee observed that the omnipresent threat of an action for damages that could bankrupt the union, possible in the light of the Viking and Laval judgments issued by the European Court of Justice (ECJ), created a situation where the rights under the Convention could not be exercised. While noting the Government's statement that the impact of the ECJ judgments was limited, the Committee referred to the likelihood of such issues becoming more frequent within the current context of globalization, particularly in certain sectors of employment, like the airline sector and considered that the doctrine being articulated in these ECJ judgments was likely to have a significant restrictive effect on the exercise of the right to strike in practice in a manner contrary to the Convention.

In its latest report, the Government points out that, even if there were an international dimension to a United Kingdom trade dispute, it was far from clear that the industrial action involved would fail to meet the legitimacy and proportionality requirements laid down in the ECJ case law. In any event, the Government indicated that in so far as the proportionality tests might apply to United Kingdom industrial action, these tests were derived from EU treaties, to which the Government is obliged to give effect. The Government therefore considers that amendment of the TULRA would not have any impact on the proportionality tests set out in these judgments. As regards the threat of unlimited damages, the Government observes that it has not been proven that these ECJ judgments would have the effect of nullifying the limits on damages for unlawful industrial action that are set out in the TULRA, but even if they did, the Government maintains that it could not change this impact through any unilateral action on its part. The Government concludes that the effect of the ECJ judgments on United Kingdom industrial action has not been established as no United Kingdom court has decided a case in this area and, in any event, any effect would probably be limited to the small minority of disputes which have the necessary international dimension. For these reasons, the Government considers that it is not necessary to review the TULRA or take other national measures.

The Committee wishes once again to recall the serious concern it raised as to the circumstances surrounding the BALPA proposed industrial action, for which the courts granted an injunction on the basis of the Viking and Laval case law and where the company indicated that, should the work stoppage take place, it would claim damages estimated at £100 million per day. The Committee recalls in this regard that it has been raising the need to ensure fuller protection of the right of workers to exercise legitimate industrial action in practice and considers that adequate safeguards and immunities from civil liability are necessary to ensure respect for this fundamental right, which is an intrinsic corollary of the right to organize. While taking due note of the Government's observations in relation to its obligations under EU law, the Committee considers that protection of industrial action in the country within the context of the unknown impact of the ECJ judgments referred to by the Government (which gave rise to significant legal uncertainty in the BALPA case), could indeed be bolstered by ensuring effective limitations on actions for damages so that unions are not faced with threats of bankruptcy for carrying out legitimate industrial action. The Committee further considers that a full review of the issues at hand with the social partners to determine possible action to address the concerns raised would assist in demonstrating the importance attached to ensuring respect for this fundamental right. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to review the TULRA, in full consultation with the workers' and employers' organizations concerned, with a view to ensuring that the protection of the right of workers to exercise legitimate industrial action in practice is fully effective, and to indicate any further measures taken in this regard.

Reinstatement of workers having participated in lawful industrial action. In its previous comments, the Committee recalled that for the right to strike to be effectively guaranteed, the workers who stage a lawful strike should be able to return to their posts after the end of the industrial action. Making the return to work conditional on time limits and on the employer's consent constituted, in the Committee's view, obstacles to the effective exercise of this right, which constitutes an essential means for workers to promote and defend the interests of their members. The Committee therefore requested the Government to indicate any measures taken or contemplated with a view to strengthening the protection available to workers who stage official and lawfully organized industrial action.

The Committee notes that the Government reiterates that those participating in lawfully organized, official industrial action are protected against dismissal for action which lasts 12 weeks or less. Dismissing a worker for taking industrial action during this period is considered to be automatically unfair. Virtually all industrial action in the United Kingdom lasts less than 12 weeks and therefore this protection extends to virtually all workers who stage official and lawfully organized strikes. In addition, regardless of the duration of the industrial action, an employer cannot dismiss a worker for taking industrial action if the employer has failed to take reasonable procedural steps to resolve the dispute with the trade union (i.e. agreed procedures for dispute resolution). The Government however maintains that it is not appropriate to support the view that an employer must never dismiss employees under any circumstances when they take protected industrial action. In any event, the sacking of strikers is very rare in the United Kingdom.

The Committee recalls the importance it attaches to the maintenance of the employment relationship as a normal legal consequence of the recognition of the right to strike (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 139). While provisions that enable employers to dismiss workers during or at the conclusion of an industrial action on the grounds of illegitimate or unlawful action may be in conformity with the provisions of the Convention, it considers that restricting the right to maintain the employment relationship to industrial action of twelve weeks or less places an arbitrary limit on the effective protection of the right to strike in a manner contrary to the Convention. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to review the TULRA, in full consultation with workers' and employers' organizations concerned, with a view to strengthening the protection available to workers who stage official and lawfully organized industrial action and to provide information on the steps taken in this regard.

Notice requirements for industrial action. In its previous comments, the Committee had taken note of comments made by the TUC to the effect that the notice requirements for an industrial action to be protected by immunity were unjustifiably burdensome. The Committee notes from the Government's report that it held discussions with the TUC about these issues during the reporting period, but that no agreement was reached. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on developments in this regard, as well as any relevant statistics or reports on the practical application and effect of these requirements.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1950)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) a communication dated 24 August 2010 and by the Trades Union Congress (TUC) in a communication dated 28 October 2010. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union discrimination and acts of interference. The Committee recalls that in its previous observation it had noted detailed information provided by the Government on the relevant legislative provisions protecting individuals from dismissal or other detriment in relation to their right to belong to a trade union, participate in trade union activities and use of its services. The Committee had further noted the allegations submitted by the TUC (addressed below) and requested the Government to provide additional information, including judicial decisions, on the protection provided against acts of anti-union discrimination, including those in which the employer's main purpose is not discriminatory, and against acts of interference.

The Committee notes that the Government reiterates the view it had previously expressed that there exists significant protection of the right of individuals to belong to a trade union, to participate in its activities and use its services, including the right not to be dismissed or suffer other detriment on these grounds. The Government once again refers to sections 145A, 146 and 152 of the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992, as strengthened by the Employment Relations Act 2004, which, among other things, made it unlawful for employers to offer inducements to workers not to belong to a trade union, not to participate in a union's activities at an appropriate time and not to use a union's services at an appropriate time. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that since the last reporting period there have been no significant judicial decisions in this area.

With regard to the specific points previously raised by the TUC, the Committee notes the following information provided by the Government:

- (i) With regard to the allegation that the above-noted protection applies only where the "sole or main purpose" of the employer's action or failure to act was to discriminate against the trade unionists in question or to discourage them from having their terms and conditions of employment set by collective bargaining, the Government indicates that, in its view, it is extremely important that employers remain free to take the legitimate decisions they believe are needed to run their businesses effectively. The Government points out that, while such decisions would be illegitimate if they infringe Article 11 or other rights under the European Convention on Human Rights, nothing in the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) in the Wilson et al. v. the United Kingdom case was intended to or does prevent employers from taking decisions to reward particular employees more highly than others when the motivation for doing so is to reward such employees in the interests of the business. The Government therefore considers the use of a purpose test to be essential and points out that, under the 1992 Act, it is for the employer to show what his sole or main purpose was. In the Government's opinion, the use of a sole or main purpose test, coupled with a provision ensuring that the burden is on the employer to show what his sole or main purpose was, achieves the most satisfactory balance and is consistent with the judgment of the Court. The Government points out that Employment Tribunals are accustomed under a number of their current jurisdictions to determining what the employer's sole or main reason for, or purpose in, doing certain acts is. The Government is confident that tribunals can apply the test sensibly to distinguish between cases where offers are made for the purpose of achieving de-recognition of a union and cases where they are made for the purpose of retaining or rewarding valuable staff.

- (ii) With regard to the TUC's assertion that the rights provided for in section 145B of the 1992 Act are deficient because they are limited to situations where a trade union is recognized or is seeking recognition, but do not apply where a trade union has been de-recognized, the Government recalls that the Wilson case concerned the situation where offers were made to union members for the purpose of securing that their terms and conditions of employment would cease to be determined by collective agreement. The Government points out that, in the situation dealt with by the ECHR, the employer sought to induce trade union members to give up their existing right to have their terms determined by collective agreement; the employer was seeking to change the status quo and using inducements directed at union members to achieve his purpose. The Government further points out that section 145B is designed to address this situation and stresses that Schedule A1 to the 1992 Act contains a procedure by which a union can obtain recognition for the purpose of negotiations relating to pay, hours and holidays. The existence of this statutory procedure means that offers of the kind in question made to members of a union that is not recognized are ultimately ineffective in achieving their purpose since they cannot fetter the right of the union to request recognition and, if it is refused, to apply for a declaration of recognition under the Schedule. Nor can the making of such offers, even if accepted, affect the rights of union members under the Schedule to support their union's claim for recognition and vote in favour of it. The effect of paragraphs 156 and 161 of the Schedule is that employees and workers are protected against dismissal and other detrimental acts done by an employer on the ground, among others, that a worker acted with a view to obtaining recognition, indicated support for recognition or acted to secure bargaining arrangements under the Schedule. Furthermore, the Employment Relations Act 2004 amended the Schedule to provide for remedies against an employer or union if either of them does certain things during the period of a recognition ballot with a view to influencing the result of the ballot. These include the making of offers to a worker entitled to vote in return for his/her agreement to vote in a particular way (for example, against recognition) or to abstain from voting.
- (iii) With regards to the TUC's assertion that the right to complain about infringement of these rights is limited to individual workers and that trade unions cannot complain in their own right, the Government considers that the judgment of the ECHR does not require the creation of such a right. While the Government accepts that the Court held that the rights of the applicant unions had been infringed as well as the rights of the applicant members, it is of the opinion that the infringement of the rights of the applicant unions simply resulted from and was consequential upon the infringement of the rights of their members, rather than an infringement of a free-standing right of the unions. In the Government's view, it is not necessary to give trade unions a separate remedy in order for the law of the United Kingdom to be compatible with the judgment. The Government therefore considers it sufficient to confer the remedy for acts of the kind that the Court held to infringe Article 11 of the European Convention of Human Rights on those in relation to whom the acts complained of would be done, that is the members of trade unions.

The Committee recalls that it had also noted in its previous comments the TUC assertion that, where the incumbent trade union is non-independent, a request for de-recognition can only be made by an individual worker and not by an independent trade union; and that the independent trade union has no right of access to the workplace and no right to communicate with the workforce while de-recognition procedures are taking place, while the non-independent union has a statutory right to communicate with the workers during the de-recognition process. The Committee also notes that the ITUC refers to various unfair practices and anti-union tactics in the framework of the statutory recognition scheme. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

The Committee notes with satisfaction that, in order to try to combat the practice of some employers and employment agencies of using "blacklists", the Employment Relations Act 1999 (Blacklists) Regulations 2010 were introduced by the Government and came into force on 2 March 2010. The Committee requests the Government to provide in its next report any relevant information on the application of the Regulations in practice.

Shipping sector. The Committee had previously requested the Government to provide its observations on the TUC's allegation that contracts of employment had been found to expressly forbid individuals from contacting a recognized trade union so as to favour the conclusion of “workforce agreements” with workers’ representatives rather than collective agreements with trade unions, thereby lowering the terms and conditions of employment in the shipping sector. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that it enforces the issues relating to employment contracts in the shipping sector through the Maritime and Coastguard Agency (MCA), entitled to examine contracts of employment. The Government indicates that, in conjunction with trade unions in the shipping sector, it has acted to ensure that the MCA surveyors can readily identify clauses which prevent workers from exercising their rights under the Convention. A training course was undertaken in conjunction with NUMAST (now Nautilus International) to help MCA surveyors identify any illegal elements in contracts of employment including evidence of terms which expressly forbid individuals from contacting a recognized trade union. Section 3.3.3 of MCA Operations Advice Note number OAN 378 also addresses this issue. The Government indicates that responsible officials are fully aware of the issue and the appropriate course of action when a violation is identified. It therefore considers that no legislative action needs to be taken at this time. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the number of violations identified within the reporting period and to specify the sanctions applied against the persons responsible for such violations.

Article 4. Statutory recognition procedure. The Committee had previously requested the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to review, in consultation with the social partners, the Trade Union and Labour Relations Act (TULRA), so as to ensure that the provisions on trade union recognition for collective bargaining purposes do not prevent trade unions in workplaces where no union meets the percentage requirements for recognition (40 per cent) from engaging in collective bargaining on behalf of their own members on a voluntary basis. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the vast majority of collective bargaining in the United Kingdom is undertaken by voluntary agreement between the parties. The Government believes that voluntary collective bargaining, which by definition is acceptable to both parties and shaped by them, is preferable to arrangements imposed by law. The statutory procedure was established as a fall-back to deal with those situations where voluntary agreement cannot be reached and was designed to encourage the voluntary resolution of questions which arise during the recognition process. The Government reiterates that, under the statutory procedure, trade unions may seek recognition for collective bargaining purposes on behalf of workers in a particular bargaining unit. A bargaining unit may or may not be a workplace (and all the workers therein), but it may also be defined in other ways, such as all the workers of a particular type across some or all of the employer’s workplaces, or just some workers in one occupational category at one workplace. A trade union specifies the bargaining unit for which it seeks recognition when making an application to the Central Arbitration Committee. The Government points out that, under the statutory procedure, two or more trade unions may make a joint application for recognition. Thus, the statutory procedure in effect encourages minority trade unions, where they exist, to collaborate with each other, enabling them to obtain recognition through combination, where none would otherwise achieve it individually. The Government points out that, where no union meets the 40 per cent statutory requirement, unions are still free to seek and reach a voluntary recognition agreement with an employer in the usual way. The Government explains that the current recognition procedure has become an established feature of the United Kingdom’s industrial relations system and does not need to be reviewed.

Collective bargaining in small businesses. The Committee’s previous comments concerned the TUC’s indication that businesses employing less than 21 workers are excluded from the statutory procedure for union recognition, the effect of which has been to deny employees of small businesses the right to be represented by a trade union (Schedule 1A, paragraph 7(1), of TULRA). The Committee had noted the Government’s opinion that it would be inappropriate to subject very small organizations to the detailed legal requirements of the statutory recognition procedure. It further noted the Government’s indication that trade unions were recognized by some very small employers through voluntary agreement and that such recognized trade unions could operate very effectively in micro-businesses. The Committee had noted the TUC’s proposal to have a simplified statutory procedure for small businesses which would reconcile the fundamental right of workers with the circumstances of the business and invited the Government to examine this matter with the social partners. It had further requested the Government to furnish statistical data on the number and coverage of collective agreements, particularly in small businesses. The Committee notes the Government’s explanation that the statutory recognition procedure is not the only method whereby collective bargaining can be established in the United Kingdom: the dominant method being for bargaining arrangements to be established voluntarily and by agreement between the parties and that there are no legal provisions or other measures to discourage smaller businesses from entering such voluntary agreements. It is therefore a matter for trade unions to use the freedom they possess to organize a workforce and persuade employers to recognize them.

With regard to the number and coverage of collective agreements, the Government points out that, historically, the incidence of union membership and collective bargaining in very small organizations is relatively low. It further points out that, as collective agreements and collective bargaining arrangements are not registered with a public authority, there are no reliable figures on the number of such agreements, though the expectation is that the figure would run into very many thousands. The extent of collective bargaining is measured by periodic surveys (such as the large-scale Workplace Employment Relations Survey – WERS), or by the more regular household survey (principally, the Labour Force Survey – the LFS). The last WERS was undertaken in 2004 and another is planned to take place in 2011. The latest LFS data for 2009 indicates that 32.7 per cent of all employees, and 73.7 per cent of trade union members, had their pay affected by collective agreements. Workplaces with more than 50 employees had higher collective bargaining coverage at 45.4 per cent than those workplaces with fewer than 50 employees (19 per cent). The Government acknowledges that recognized trade unions can operate very effectively in micro-businesses. The Government reiterates that its Strategic Partnership Fund helped finance an innovative research project with three trade unions with membership in small organizations – Amicus (GPMU section), the Knitwear, Footwear and Allied Trade Union and Community – to identify the positive effects recognized trade unions can bring to small enterprises. This work was completed in April 2007. The report can be used by trade unions and employers to better understand the role of trade unions in very small organizations. This report is the property of the unions concerned and is therefore disseminated by them. Finally, the Government considers that recognition arrangements in the United Kingdom are in full compliance with the provisions of the Convention. It therefore has no plans to review the statutory recognition procedure with regard to its application in small business.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Protection against employer interference. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to indicate any measures taken or envisaged to further protect against any possible employer intimidation or interference in respect of union certification or decertification. The Committee requests the Government to provide information, in its next report, in this regard and to consider other ways of ensuring protection against acts of interference.

Coverage of management personnel. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to indicate any measures taken or envisaged to include management personnel within the scope of the Trade Union Act so as to guarantee them the rights established by the Convention. The Government had indicated that the Labour Advisory Council is in the process of finalizing a process of consideration of specific amendments to the Act which will help to protect employees generally and, specifically, will include management personnel within the scope of the Trade Union Act. The Committee requests the Government to transmit, with its next report, the amended Trade Union Act.

The Committee hoped that it would soon be able to note progress on these two issues.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87)

The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that consultation on a number of the issues raised by the Committee in its previous observation is pending and a review of the Employment Relation Law (ERL) and its codes of practice will be undertaken as soon as resources allow it. The Committee hopes that the Government will be in a position to indicate in its next report progress made with regard to reviewing the provisions of the ERL and the accompanying draft codes of practice and trusts that in this process due account will be taken of its previous comments concerning the ERL and its codes of practice, which read as follows.

Article 3 of the Convention. Right of organizations to organize their activities and formulate their programmes. The Committee had noted that under article 19 of the ERL, a strike is immune from tort only if it takes place in the framework of an “employment dispute”; according to article 20(3) of the ERL, immunity is lost if the conduct of a trade union does not conform to the definition of “reasonable conduct” when done in contemplation or furtherance of a dispute; the definition of “reasonable conduct” is found in code 2 which provides that it would be unreasonable conduct for a union to call upon employees to take part in secondary action. The Committee had recalled that a general prohibition of sympathy strikes could lead to abuse and workers should be able to take such action where the initial strike they are supporting is itself lawful (General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 168). The Committee also noted that the right to strike should not be limited solely to industrial disputes that are likely to be resolved through the signing of a collective agreement and that workers' organizations should, in principle, be able to use strike action to support their position in the search for solutions to problems posed by members and on workers in general, in particular as regards employment, social protection and the standard of living. The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated to ensure that secondary action and social and economic protest action are protected under the law.

The Committee had furthermore noted that code 2 provides that there is no immunity from tort for picketing or calling upon employees to picket a place of work other than that of the employees, as well as for interference (e.g. because of noise or crowds) in the rights of neighbouring properties (i.e. private nuisance) and for trespassing on private property. The Committee is of the view that picketing in support of secondary action should be possible and that restrictions on strike pickets should be limited to cases where the action ceases to be peaceful (General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 174). The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated to ensure that pickets in support of secondary action is possible and that limitations on strike pickets apply only where the action ceases to be peaceful.

The Committee had noted that an “employment dispute” can be according to article 1(1) of the ERL, either individual or collective; a collective employment dispute is defined in article 5 of the ERL as one taking place where a collective agreement already exists. According to Unite, this provision allows the employer to deny union immunity for industrial action simply by terminating the collective agreement; furthermore, in case of a recognition dispute where no collective agreement exists, the conditions allowing for strikes to be staged are met under article 5 of the ERL only where the employer employs more than 21 employees; thus, according to comments made by Unite, industrial action to further a recognition claim in small establishments is not immune from action in tort. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on the comments made by Unite and to indicate in its next report the measures taken to ensure that the conditions for protected industrial action are not such as to render such action virtually impossible, especially in relation to recognition disputes in small establishments.

The Committee had observed that articles 22 and 24 of the ERL provide that in the absence of the parties' consent to the terms of a binding award, the Jersey Employment Tribunal (JET) can issue a declaration which is de facto and de jure integrated in individual contracts of employment and is therefore tantamount to binding arbitration. Code 3 contains similar provisions. The Committee had recalled that compulsory arbitration seriously limits the means available to trade unions to further and defend the interests of their members as well as their right to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes and is not compatible with Article 3 of Convention No. 87 (General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 153). The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated to ensure that compulsory arbitration is only possible in the case of essential services in the strict sense of the term, public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or where both parties agree to binding arbitration.

The Committee had noted that code 2 provides that "a small island community such as Jersey may have services which are considered essential to society which are different to those in the mainland United Kingdom, for example, a stoppage in transport links services would cause greater difficulties and inconveniences that are detrimental to the population". The Committee had recalled that transportation is not an essential service in the strict sense of the term where strikes may be prohibited; however, in order to avoid damages which are irreversible or out of all proportion to the occupational interests of the parties to the dispute, the authorities could establish a system of negotiated minimum service in services which are of public utility rather than impose an outright ban on strikes (General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 160). The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated to amend code 2 so as to ensure that transportation is not included among essential services, taking account of the possibility of introducing a negotiated minimum service.

The Committee had noted that article 3 of the ERL and code 2 contain a requirement of notice prior to industrial action; the notice should contain such information as to help the employer make plans to enable it to advise its customers of the possibility of disruption, so that they can make alternative arrangements or to take steps to ensure the health and safety of the employees, or the public, or to safeguard equipment which might otherwise suffer damage from being shut down or left without supervision. While noting that the obligation to give prior notice before calling a strike is in line with the Convention, the Committee also noted the comments by Unite according to which in one English case, an injunction was granted by the court to stop an industrial action because the union had failed to identify the specific site where each lecturer on strike had their desk, despite the fact that the union had specified the exact number of lecturers, the grade of every lecturer, and the department or sub-department in which they worked; Unite emphasized that there is no explicit provision to ensure that there is no obligation to name employees who participate in a strike and to confine the information to be provided only to that which is in the union's possession. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on the comments made by Unite and to indicate any judicial decisions relevant to the application by the courts of articles 3 and 20(2) of the ERL as well as code 3.

The Committee finally recalls the conclusions and recommendations reached on the ERL and its accompanying codes by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2473 (349th Report, paragraphs 261–278).

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98)

The Committee notes from the Government's report that the Employment (Amendment No. 4) (Jersey) Law came into force on 30 June 2009. The Committee further notes that in respect of the other comments made by the Committee in its last observation, the authorities indicate that the review of the employment relations legislation, including the Employment Relation Law (ERL) and its codes of practice, has been delayed due to the global economic downturn and the need to introduce new legislation to give statutory protection to workers in redundancy and insolvency situation. The Committee also notes the conclusions and recommendations reached on the ERL and its accompanying codes by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2473 (349th Report, paragraphs 261–278) concerning notably the protection against acts of interference and the promotion of collective bargaining.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. In its previous observation, the Committee had noted from the Government's report that the Employment (Jersey) Law, 2003 (EL), provides that a dismissal is automatically unfair, from day one of employment, where an employee claims to have been dismissed on grounds relating to: being or proposing to become a trade union member; taking part in, or proposing to take part in, trade union activities at an appropriate time; not being a trade union member, or refusing to become (or remain) a member; and selection for redundancy on grounds relating to union membership or activities. In this respect, the Committee notes with interest that the Employment (Amendment No. 4) (Jersey) Law, 2009, has amended the ERL so that under articles 77B and 77C, a tribunal can now issue an order of reinstatement or re-engagement in cases of unfair dismissals (i.e. re-employment under terms which, as far as possible, are as favourable as if the employee had been reinstated, unless the employee was partly to blame for the dismissal).

In its previous comments, the Committee had also noted, however, that according to articles 77B and 77C, the Tribunal does not have the power to compensate an employee for financial losses such as arrears of pay for the period between the dismissal and the order for reinstatement or re-employment. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to guarantee, in cases of anti-union dismissals: (1) the payment of arrears of pay, for the period between the dismissal and the order for reinstatement or re-employment; and (2) a compensation for the prejudice suffered.

Articles 2 and 4. Protection against acts of interference and promotion of collective bargaining. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted from the Government's report that there are currently no specific provisions protecting against acts of interference in the EL or the ERL, but that it was the Minister's intention to introduce via the ERL a positive duty to prohibit employers from "buying out" employees' rights in respect of union activities by inducing employees not to join a workers' organization, or to relinquish membership of such an organization. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the authorities are still working on those provisions and intend that the relevant provision will have been prepared in advance of the next reporting period. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any development in this regard.

Draft code 1 on the recognition of trade unions (code 1). In this regard, the Committee had noted that according to the comments made by the Unite trade union (Unite), code 1 sets out two criteria which it regards as key to recognition: (i) the bargaining unit; and (ii) the wishes of the employees.

(i) The bargaining unit: So far as the bargaining unit is concerned, the code states that, where no agreement has been reached, this criterion will only be taken to have been met if there are no employees in the bargaining unit in respect of whom the employer already recognizes one or more trade unions for the purposes of collective bargaining. According to Unite, such provisions enable the employer to recognize any union in respect of any employees even if the union is not representative, thereby preventing a representative union from accessing the statutory recognition procedure; moreover, the code does not specify that the union so recognized should be independent, which could lead to acts of interference by employers.

In its previous report, the Committee had further noted that the abovementioned criteria concerning the establishment and recognition of a bargaining unit also runs contrary to the principle in the ERL and the codes themselves that unions should be representative of workers. For example, article 1 of the ERL prevents agreements from qualifying as "collective agreements" within the law, unless concluded between an employer and a trade union representing a "substantial proportion of the employees engaged in the trade or industry concerned". The Committee recalls that the right to collective bargaining of the most representative organization of the bargaining unit should be guaranteed. The Committee hopes that code 1 will be amended in this connection.

(ii) The wishes of the employees: In its previous report, the Committee had noted that according to code 1, the second criteria that is key for trade union recognition is the wish of the majority of employees, and therefore an employer should only be required to recognize a trade union where it can be clearly demonstrated that the majority of the employees within the bargaining unit want the trade union to be recognized by the employer. The Committee had recalled that where, under a system for nominating an exclusive bargaining agent, there is no union representing the required percentage to be so designated, collective bargaining rights should be granted to all unions in a unit, at least on behalf of their own members. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide in its next report information on the measures taken or contemplated so as to ensure that where no union represents the majority of employees in a bargaining unit, collective bargaining rights are granted to all unions in the unit, at least on behalf of their own members.

The Committee hopes that the Government will be in a position to indicate in its next report progress made with regard to reviewing the provisions of the ERL and the accompanying draft codes of practice so as to ensure that trade unions enjoy the full guarantee of the rights available under the Convention.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1954)

The Committee takes note of the Government's detailed reply to the comments of 2008 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC). It also notes the comments of 30 August 2010 by the International Organization of Employers (IOE), the Uruguayan Chamber of Industries (CIU) and the National Chamber of Commerce and Services of Uruguay (CNCS), objecting in particular to certain provisions of Act No. 18566 on collective bargaining.

The Committee notes the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2699, in which the complainants alleged that the abovementioned Act was inconsistent with the Convention.

Article 4 of the Convention. In its previous comments the Committee noted that, according to the Government, the national legislation lacks a single comprehensive text regulating collective bargaining and, consequently, part of the doctrine holds that there are two models of collective bargaining in the country: the typical model and the model that has grown out of the convening of wages councils. The Committee pointed out in this connection that decisions fixing minimum wages may be taken by tripartite bodies, but emphasized that according to the principles of free and voluntary collective bargaining between parties, laid down in Article 4 of the Convention, other conditions of work should be set by workers' and employers' organizations without interference from public authorities.

The Committee notes that in its report the Government states that with the adoption of Act No. 18566 of September 2009, the limitation mentioned in its last report has been resolved and the promotion requirement set in the Convention has now been met.

The Committee notes in this connection that the Committee on Freedom of Association drew up the following conclusions regarding Act No. 18566 [see 356th Report, Case No. 2699, para. 1389]:

- I. with respect to the exchange of information necessary to allow the normal conduct of the process of collective bargaining and that in the case of confidential information, its communication carries the implicit obligation of secrecy, and breach thereof would give rise to civil liability of those who are in breach (article 4), the Committee considers that all the parties to the negotiation, whether or not they have legal personality, must be liable for any breaches of the right to secrecy of the information which they receive in the framework of collective bargaining. The Committee requests the Government to ensure that this principle is respected;
- II. as regards the composition of the Higher Tripartite Council (article 8), the Committee considers that an equal number of members could be taken into account for each of the three sectors, and also the appointment of an independent chairperson, preferably nominated by the workers' and employers' organizations jointly, who could break the deadlock in the event of a vote. The Committee requests the Government to hold discussions with the social partners on the modification of the law so as to arrive at a negotiated solution to the number of members of the Council;
- III. with respect to the powers of the Higher Tripartite Council and in particular considering and pronouncing on questions related to the tripartite and bipartite bargaining levels (article 10, paragraph (d)), the Committee has emphasized on many occasions that "the determination of the bargaining level is essentially a matter to be left to the discretion of the parties". [See Digest of the decisions and principles of the Freedom of Association Committee, fifth edition, 2006, para. 989.] The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures including the amendment of existing legislation to ensure that the bargaining level is established by the parties and is not subject to voting in a tripartite body;
- IV. as regards the possibility of wages councils establishing conditions of work for each case to be agreed by the employers' and workers' delegates in the respective wage group (article 12), the Committee recalls, firstly, that under ILO standards, the fixing of minimum wages may be subject to decisions by tripartite bodies. On the other hand, recalling that it is up to the legislative authority to determine the legal minimum standards for conditions of work and that Article 4 of Convention No. 98 seeks to promote bipartite bargaining to fix conditions of work, the Committee hopes that in application of those principles, any collective agreement on fixing of conditions of employment will be the result of an agreement between the parties, as the article in question appears to envisage;

The Committee notes in this connection the Government's statement in its report that the competence of the wages councils is aligned with the provisions of section 83 of Act No. 16002 of 25 November 1988, covering conditions of work, but extends to the latter only where there is agreement between the social partners, which means that a tripartite body may not vote on matters pertaining to conditions of work, but does have a vote when it comes to determining minimum wages by category.

The conclusions of the committee continue as follows:

- V. with respect to the subject of bipartite collective bargaining and, in particular, that in company collective bargaining where there is no workers' organization, bargaining authority should pass to the representative higher level organization (article 14, last sentence), the Committee observes that the complainant organizations consider that the absence of a trade union does not mean the absence of collective relations in the company. The Committee considers, on the one hand, that bargaining with the most representative higher trade union level organization should only take place if it had a number of members in the company in accordance with the national legislation of each country. The Committee recalls, on the other hand, that the Collective Agreements Recommendation, 1951 (No. 91), gives pre-eminence to workers' organizations as one of the parties to collective bargaining, and refers to representatives of non-organized workers only in the case of absence of such organizations. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that future legislation takes these principles fully into account;
- VI. as regards the effects of the collective agreement and, in particular, that the collective agreement by sector of activity concluded by the most representative organizations is of mandatory application to all employers and workers at the respective bargaining level once it has been registered and published by the Executive Power (article 16), the Committee, taking into account the concern expressed by the complainant organizations, requests the Government to ensure that the process of registration and publication of the collective agreement only involves checks on compliance with the legal minima and questions of form, such as, for example, the determination of the parties and the beneficiaries of the agreement with sufficient precision and the duration of the agreement;
- VII. as regards the duration of collective agreements and, in particular, the maintenance in force of all the clauses of the agreement which has expired until a new agreement replaces it, unless the parties have agreed otherwise (article 17, second paragraph), the Committee recalls that the duration of collective agreements is primarily a matter for the parties involved, but if government action is being considered any legislation should reflect tripartite agreement [see Digest, op.cit., para. 1047]. In these circumstances, taking into account that the complainant organizations have expressed disagreement with the whole idea of automatic continuing effect of collective agreements, the Committee invites the Government to discuss with the social partners on amendments to the legislation in order to find a solution acceptable to both parties.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that contacts and consultations are being sought with workers' and employers' organizations with a view to examining the recommendations made by the Committee on Freedom of Association regarding the law and that a tripartite body is to meet shortly to deal with the recommendations in depth. The Committee expresses the firm hope that, in consultation with the social partners, the legislation will be brought fully into conformity with the Convention, and requests the Government to provide any information on this matter in its next report. The Committee underlines in this regard, the information provided by the Government regarding the beginning of the tripartite discussions.

Public sector. In its previous observation the Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government on the preparation of a bill on collective bargaining in the public sector and asked the Government to report on progress towards its enactment. The Committee notes with satisfaction that, according to the Government, Act No. 18508 on collective bargaining in the context of industrial relations in the public sector has been adopted and is in keeping with the Framework Agreement on collective bargaining in the public sector concluded on 22 July 2005 by the Executive and the Inter-Union Assembly of Workers – National Convention of Workers (PIT–CNT).

Article 4 of the Convention. Collective bargaining. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to amend certain provisions of the Labour Code, in particular sections 21(1), 23(1), 31, 35, 36, 48, 49 and 59 so as to ensure that the legislation makes it clear that, only in the absence of trade unions at the enterprise, branch or territory, the authorization to bargain collectively can be conferred to other representative bodies elected by workers. The Committee notes with regret that in its report, the Government provides no indication on measures taken or envisaged in this respect. The Committee once again recalls that direct negotiation between the undertaking and its employees, bypassing sufficiently representative organizations where these exist, might be detrimental to the principle that negotiation between employers and organizations of workers should be encouraged and promoted. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to amend the abovementioned sections so as to ensure that it is clear that only in the event where there are no trade unions at the enterprise, branch or the territory, an authorization to bargain collectively can be conferred to other representative bodies. The Committee requests the Government to indicate measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee had previously requested the Government to provide the relevant legislative texts establishing the procedure for settlement of collective labour disputes, as referred to in sections 33 and 281 of the Labour Code. Noting that the Government provides no information in this regard, the Committee reiterates its previous request.

Articles 5 and 6. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to provide detailed information on trade union and collective bargaining rights of public servants and to list the categories of workers excluded from the application of the Convention. The Committee notes with regret that the Government provides no specific information in this regard and reiterates instead, as it did in its previous report that the application of Convention does not extend to public servants and shall in no way be interpreted as depriving them of their rights or status. The Committee recalls that the only exceptions that may be allowed to the guarantees laid down in the Convention concern armed forces, police and public servants who are engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee recalls that while Article 6 of the Convention allows public servants engaged in the administration of the State to be excluded from its scope, other categories should enjoy the guarantees of the Convention and therefore be able to negotiate collectively their conditions of employment, including wages. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to provide detailed information on trade union and collective bargaining rights of public servants and to list the categories of workers excluded from the application of the Convention and therefore not enjoying the rights enshrined therein.

Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1982)

The Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) of 24 August 2010, the Federation of Chambers and Associations of Commerce and Production of Venezuela (FEDECAMARAS), dated 31 August 2010, the Confederation of Workers of Venezuela (CTV), dated 3 June 2010, and the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), dated 8 November 2010 (the Government replied to the latter comments a few days later). The Committee also notes the comments of the Single National Union of Public Employees of the Venezuelan Corporation of Guayana (SUNEP–CVG), dated 10 November 2009, and of the Independent Trade Union Alliance (ASI), dated 31 August 2010. The Committee notes the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association in the cases presented by national and international organizations of workers (Cases Nos 2422 and 2674) and employers (Case No. 2254) and observes that three more cases are currently under examination (Cases Nos 2711, 2727 and 2736). The Committee observes that Cases Nos 2254 and 2727 have been included by the Committee on Freedom of Association in the category of serious and urgent cases which it specially draws to the attention of the Governing Body of the ILO. The Committee notes the discussion in June 2010 on the application of the Convention in the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela in the Committee on the Application of Standards of the International Labour Conference. The Committee of Experts observe that the Conference Committee requested the Government to accept high-level technical assistance from the International Labour Standards Department and regrets that the Government has not responded to this request. The Committee notes the Government's replies to the comments of the ITUC of 26 August 2009 and 24 August 2010, of the CTV of 3 June 2010, of the ASI and of FEDECAMARAS of 31 August 2010, and of the IOE of 8 November 2010, and requests it to send its observations on the communication from SUNEP-CVG and ASI.

Murders of trade union leaders and members and issues relating to compliance with the human rights of trade unionists and employers' leaders

In its comments in 2009, the Committee noted that, according to the ITUC, four trade union leaders were murdered in December 2008 in the State of Aragua, for whom the names were supplied. Furthermore, according to the ITUC, the murders were also committed of 19 trade unionists and ten workers in the construction and petroleum sectors in the context of disputes relating to the negotiation and sale of jobs (according to the ITUC, there were 48 homicides in 2007, for which no investigations were conducted). According to the ITUC, new sections 357 and 360 of the reformed text of the Penal Code repress and punish with sanctions the right of peaceful demonstration and the right to strike, while the Special People's Defence Act against hoarding, speculation and boycotts restricts labour protest action and other forms of social mobilization. According to the ITUC, the authorities have made use on 70 occasions of sections 357 and 360 of the Penal Code and section 56 of the Basic Security Act in the context of strikes and demonstrations. The CTV indicated in its 2009 comments that hundreds of workers and trade union leaders were the victims of murders in the construction sector, without any arrests being made up to then. The CTV indicated that over 2,000 workers, including trade union leaders, had been brought before the criminal courts under a "probationary system" under which they have to report regularly to the judicial authorities. They are then released, but are prohibited from engaging in any protest activities. Eleven workers in the metropolitan town hall were detained for engaging in protests against the Special Act respecting municipal authorities. The Committee takes note of the Government's reply to the alleged detentions, which is examined below.

FEDECAMARAS, in its 2009 comments, indicated that employers who, in the context of their sectoral representative activities, protest against the kidnapping of their members or the fall in national production as a result of government policies are the victims of threats by the authorities (such as in the case of the President of FEDENAGA) and of the occupation and expropriation of land or interference with their enterprises and property. Various important enterprises have been the victims of harassment and fines, and the closure has been ordered of television enterprises which gave air time to employers. The food and agricultural sectors are subject to discretionary practices by the authorities. Furthermore, the investigations by the authorities into the attack on the premises of FEDECAMARAS on 26 May 2007 and the attempted bomb attack on 24 February 2008 (carried out by an inspector of the metropolitan police, whose explosive device blew up and killed him) on its headquarters have not produced any results (according to the Government, arrest warrants have however been issued against two persons).

In its previous comments, the Committee noted with concern the various provisions of the Penal Code and other legislation which tend to restrict the exercise of the right to demonstrate and the right to strike and which criminalize legitimate trade union activities, as well as the allegations that a climate of intimidation is being intensified towards workers' and employers' organizations and their leaders which do not support the Government.

In its comments prior to 2010, the SUNEP-CVG transcribes a series of procedural and penal provisions which in its view restrict trade union rights and it refers to restrictive measures and sentences of detention against trade unionists given by criminal courts as an automatic response to requests by the Office of the Public Prosecutor when they engage in demonstrations or protest action. The SUNEP-CVG indicates that demonstrators who are detained frequently end up under probation having to report regularly to the courts without knowing what they are charged with (certain workers also have cover long distances to report to the judicial authorities). Furthermore, the so-called basic state enterprises or essential services are defined in terms that are too broad and strike action in them can give rise to prison sentences under the Act respecting individual access to goods and services or under the provisions respecting boycotts, agro-food sovereignty or products of primary necessity or those subject to price controls, which may result in the imprisonment of strikers, as occurred for example in a private coffee factory. SUNEP-CVG requests the Committee to ask the Government to provide information on measures of detention or restricting freedom of movement applied to trade unionists for participating in demonstrations and strikes.

According to the ITUC, various institutions are expressing concern at the statements by the State Prosecutor of Miranda, Omaira Camacho, in which she threatened to take legal action against unions in the education sector which insisted on the stoppage of teaching as a measure of pressure to demand the pensions clause, in relation to the call by the Union of Education Workers (SINTRAENSEÑANZA) and the Union of Education Workers of the State of Miranda (SITREEM) to give effect to the collective agreement which establishes a period of 20 years of service to benefit from the retirement pension. According to the ITUC, 52 workers were also detained because of a 48-hour stoppage organized by the union SUTTIS.

In its 2010 comments, the CTV refers to the detention and physical aggression against nurses who are trade union members, on 25 May 2010, who were referred to the judicial authorities for the offence of "disregard for authority" for having exercised their right to demonstrate. The Committee notes the Government's statements that the Office of the Prosecutor-General of the Republic has indicated in this respect that investigations were opened into a labour dispute in the Concepción Palacios maternity unit in which a violent protest erupted, resulting in two police officers being injured. The judicial authorities ordered the immediate release of the two nurses, who were freed on 27 May 2010.

In its communication of 31 August 2010, the Independent Trade Union Alliance (ASI) indicates that there currently exist high levels of violence affecting the trade union movement. The 46 murders are a cause for concern, added to the 29 murders during the previous period. Furthermore, 16 trade union leaders were attacked and five others received death threats. Even though those responsible are not state agents, and in general they consist of departures from the exercise of freedom of association, it is the duty of the State to safeguard the physical integrity of its citizens. Moreover, the question of impunity arises, as arrest warrants were only issued in nine cases, and only one person was brought to the courts. According to the ASI, over the most recent period, 473 persons have been dismissed for reasons of a trade union nature in both the public and private sectors.

FEDECAMARAS indicates in its 2010 communications that various of its representatives and former representatives (of whom it supplies the names) have been harassed, threatened or detained, prosecuted and sentenced to the probationary measure of having to report regularly to the judicial authorities. The President of FEDECAMARAS is being prosecuted for an interview. FEDECAMARAS indicates that it is the victim of insults and threats by the President of the Republic, who has repeatedly stated that FEDECAMARAS is the enemy of the people and of the country. Moreover, the authorities have closed important radio and television stations, including the CNB network, which belongs to the President of the Venezuelan Chamber of the Broadcasting Industry, which suffered theft, including the theft of computers. The television broadcaster Globovisión is threatened with closure and its president and his son were the victims of a detention order. All of these communication media were used by FEDECAMARAS. In its 2010 communication, the IOE alleges that during the night of 27 October 2010 a group of five armed and hooded men attacked with machine guns, kidnapped and ill-treated in Caracas the President of FEDECAMARAS, Noel Álvarez, the former President Ms Albis Muñoz, the Executive Director, Luis Villegas, and the Treasurer, Ernesto Villamil. The kidnappers also wounded Ms Albis Muñoz, Employer member of the Governing Body of the ILO, with three bullets to her body. After losing blood, the attackers pulled her out of the vehicle in which they were travelling and left her abandoned near the Pérez Carreño hospital, where she was taken some time afterwards by a passing police patrol. The other three persons who had been abducted were freed two hours later, after the kidnappers had made a pretence at kidnapping and expressed the intention of demanding a ransom of bolívares 300 million, after first relieving them of their belongings. According to the IOE, in view of the form taken by the attack, everything would appear to indicate that its objective was to eject the employers' leaders of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela, even though the pretence was then made that it was a kidnapping. The IOE adds that the climate of aggression and hostility towards the private sector, and particularly towards FEDECAMARAS and its leaders, which is constantly displayed by the highest institutions of the State, and particularly by the President of the Republic himself, and the increasing situation of insecurity in the country, mean that the State is responsible for this new episode of violence against Venezuelan employers' leaders.

The Committee notes the Government's reply in which it condemns the attack against the persons referred to above, indicates that the competent authorities immediately launched investigations to bring those responsible to justice, and that two of them have been detained and three others identified. Moreover, one of the presumed authors has been fatally wounded after an assault with the public servants of the criminal scientific investigation services. It adds that they are all members of a gang engaged in robbery and abduction. The Government refutes the IOE's speculation that the attack was intended to remove the Venezuelan employers' leaders. The Government refutes the allegations against the public authorities made by the IOE, which it qualifies as political strategies. The Committee notes that the Government refutes the statements by employers' organizations concerning threats and alleged harassment, and the claims that there will be reprisals for the statements made by Employers' delegates to the International Labour Conference in 2010.

With reference to the assassinations of trade union leaders and members, the Government refers to the deep concern expressed by the Committee of Experts in its previous observation at, "particularly taking into account the high number of assassinations of trade union leaders and members, the apparent impunity of those responsible". The Government wishes to emphasize that there has not been a "high number of assassinations", but rather isolated cases, and specifically that the ILO has received denunciations of five cases (in Tigre and Anaucos), concerning which the Government has provided all the information requested by the various ILO supervisory bodies. All of these cases are under investigation and, where it has been possible to identify those responsible, they have been referred to the respective courts and detained by judicial order (one of those responsible died while committing another crime).

With regard to the murder of the trade union leaders Wilfredo Rafael Hernández, Jesús Argenis Guevara and Jesús Alberto Hernández, members of the Bolivarian Union of Construction Industry Workers, in Tigre, Anzoátegui State, on 24 June 2009, the Office of the Prosecutor-General of the Republic, with the assistance of the police, succeeded in determining the responsibility of Pedro Guillermo Rondón, who died while committing another crime.

With regard to the ITUC's allegation in 2009 that "the murders were also committed of 19 trade unionists and ten workers in the construction and petroleum sectors", the Government indicates that these are unfounded allegations and reports without any supporting evidence, and moreover that no formal complaints have been made concerning the alleged murders. The Government therefore does not have full and reliable information to provide in reply on this subject. The Government respectfully suggests that the ILO supervisory bodies, before issuing any judgement on a country, should request complainants to provide evidence of their allegations. The Committee observes that in its 2010 comments the ITUC does not provide further details on the acts of anti-union violence alleged in 2009, but indicates that various trade union leaders were assassinated as a result of disputes in the construction and petroleum sectors. The Committee invites the ITUC and the ASI to provide further details on the cases of the murders of trade unionists to which they referred (names, offices held in the trade unions, date of the murder, criminal charges brought, etc.).

The Government also categorically refutes indications by the Committee of apparent “impunity” which it understands to mean a denial of justice and a lack of the will to punish those responsible. The Venezuelan State, through its competent institutions, has undertaken the respective investigations and made the necessary efforts to find those responsible for criminal acts in the shortest possible time, in so doing seeking to comply with the provisions of the law and accordingly with the principles and values of a State governed by the rule of law and justice. It is therefore difficult to speak to impunity.

The Government adds that in May 2010 the Working Group was established on trade union violence in the construction sector, with the participation of the four existing workers’ federations (two of which are affiliated with the CTV) and two employers’ chambers (one affiliated to FEDECAMARAS), as well as representatives of all the competent authorities. Furthermore, at the request of the National Federation of Workers, a Special Commission was established with the Ministry of the Interior and Justice with a view to following up cases of violence in which the victims are trade union leaders and agreeing upon measures to prevent acts and crimes against the trade union movement. The Special Commission held meetings in each State of the country, reviewed cases of violence against trade union leaders, followed up the investigations conducted and the situation with regard to prosecutions and examined proposals to make protection for trade union activities more effective. The Committee welcomes this information and requests the Government to provide information on the outcome of the Working Group and Special Commission referred to above.

With regard to situations of “hired murderers” and the alleged absence of the detention of those responsible and of the respective procedures, the Government indicates that in recent years groups have been captured whose objective and firm instructions were to destabilize the country, causing levels of violence and crime never before seen in the country. The victims of “hired murderers” have included not only workers in the construction industry, but also rural workers and trade union members, among others. The national Government, the trade unions, men and women workers, communities and social movements have engaged in determined measures to bring to an end this abhorrent practice and catch those responsible for these crimes. The crime of “hired assassination” is defined in section 12 of the Basic Act to combat organized crime, which provides that “any person who kills another individual under contract or in compliance with orders from an organized crime group, shall be liable to a sentence of imprisonment of between 25 and 30 years. The same penalty shall be applied to any person who takes out a contract for a murder, and the members of the organization which issued and applied the contract”. The Government adds that, on the grounds of his alleged involvement in the death of trade union member Manuel Felipe Araujo Fuenmayor (February 2009), the 22nd Office of the Public Prosecutor brought formal charges against the police officer from the State of Aragua, Víctor Salazar. It adds that Luis Serrano, Pablo Yépez, Eudis Inojosa, Noel Armas, Douglas Granadillo, Edison Santamaría and Rony Pacheco (trade union members) were also charged by the sixth Court of the State of Aragua and were placed under probation with the requirement to report to the court every 30 days. They were also prohibited from being in the vicinity of the place where the crime was committed and to be ready to respond to any request by the prosecutor or the court. On 27 February 2010, those allegedly responsible for the “hired killing” of the rural leader Nelson López Torrealba were detained by officers of the Forensic, Penal and Criminal Investigation Unit (CICPC), in accordance with the arrest warrants issued against them. At the request of the Office of the Public Prosecutor, three citizens were detained who were allegedly involved in the death of rural leader Nelson López Torrealba, which occurred on 12 February 2009. During the initial hearings, the 58th National Prosecutor’s Office, the 14th Office of the State of Yaracuy, and the auxiliary Prosecutor, charged Ángel Jesús Vargas, Rolando Arsenio Díaz and Alberto Ramón Mendoza with “hired killing” and unlawful association for the purpose of committing offences of organized crime. In addition, Rolando Arsenio Díaz was also charged with the concealment of a firearm and enrichment from goods resulting from the crime. The fifth Tribunal of the State of Yaracuy ordered the detention, as requested by the Office of the Public Prosecutor, and agreed that those charged should remain in custody. In February 2009, the alleged murderer was detained for the “hired killing” of Yuniór Hermoso, a member of the United Socialist Party of Venezuela, and was referred to the Office of the Public Prosecutor with a view to the corresponding procedure. The person who ordered the crime was also identified, although the competent bodies did not succeed in arresting him. In April 2009, the CICPC caught Deivis José Sabino Hernández, suspected of murdering Orangel Rafael Marchán Olivero, a trade union member in the construction industry. In April of this year, the Office of the Public Prosecutor approved the charges against Julio César Arguinzonez, the principal suspect of the murder of trade union leaders Richard Gallardo, Carlos Requena and Luis Hernández on 27 November 2008. During the preliminary hearing, the 22nd (E) Office of the Public Prosecutor of the State of Aragua approved the charges against that person for alleged involvement in the crimes of aggravated homicide and the concealment of a firearm and ammunition, as envisaged and penalized in the Penal Code and the Act respecting firearms and explosives. When the evidence had been assessed, the ninth Tribunal of the State of Aragua found the charges receivable and authorized oral public hearings. Accordingly, Julio César Arguinzonez remains in detention, as ordered by the above Court. The CICPC is investigating the murders of two trade union leaders (Keler Orangel Maneiro (Sutrabolívar) and Sergio Bladimir Devis (Sutic Municipio Piar)), committed in May 2009. In the same month, six persons allegedly involved in the murder of rural leader Juan Bautista Durán, who died on 3 December 2008 in the State of Portuguesa, were detained. The third Office of the Public Prosecutor of this jurisdiction charged Aquilino Pontón and Santiago Hernández Pérez with ordering the murder, and Johan David Hernández Castillo with committing the crime of “hired killing”. The public prosecutor in the case also charged Gerardo José Noguera Valera, Gustavo Miguel Suárez Méndez, Jorge Alfonso Dueño and José Francisco Guevara with the alleged crime of being associates in homicide. The first Tribunal of the State of Portuguesa granted preventive custody as requested by the Office of the Public Prosecutor and ordered the detention of those charged. In the same month, in the State of Zulia, Isdelvy Parra was detained, and the case was referred to the fourth Tribunal of Merida, which ordered detention for the crimes of criminal association, “hired killing” and obstruction of freedom of trade. In June 2009, 24 police officers from Anzoátegui were prosecuted for their alleged responsibility for the murders (in January 2009) of workers José Javier Marcano and Pedro Suárez of the MMC Automotriz de Barcelona (Mitsubishi) and Macusa.

During the same month, at the request of the Office of the Public Prosecutor, seven members of the Construction Union of the State of Mérida (SINEITRACOM) were detained for their alleged involvement in the murders of three citizens in 2006 and 2008. The dead were identified as: José Luis Romero Castillo, Carlos Alberto Méndez and Jorge Coromoto Barreto Arellano. During the preliminary hearing, the 41st Office of the National Public Prosecutor, and the 2nd Office of the State of Mérida, charged Juan Carlos Mendoza, Giovanni Oviedo, Orlando Mendoza, Pablo Puentes, María Sosa, Jean Carlos Ramírez, Darwin Ortega, Gregorio Medina and Luis Guillén with the alleged crimes of criminal association, “hired killing” and obstruction of the freedom of trade, as envisaged and penalized by the Act to combat organized crime. The fourth Tribunal of the State of Merida ordered the detention of Juan Carlos Mendoza, Giovanni Oviedo, Orlando Mendoza, Pablo Puentes, María Sosa and Jean Carlos Ramírez. It placed on probation Darwin Ortega, Gregorio Medina y Luis Guillén. In October 2010, officials of the CICPC of the State of Yaracuy dismantled a criminal gang known as “Los carasucias”, devoted to “hired killings”.

The Government adds that all these are some of the results achieved in the incessant fight against criminality, and particularly against what is known as “hired killing”, by the Government and its institutions jointly with citizens, social organizations, rural inhabitants and men and women workers. Despite these major efforts, the Government is continuing to take the necessary measures to prevent this abhorrent practice being imposed in the country. The Committee appreciates the Government’s information on the detention and criminal prosecution of persons involved in acts of violence against trade union leaders and members. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on all the cases of anti-union violence in the country, the opening of investigations and criminal prosecutions against those responsible, the arrest warrants issued and the sentences applied.

With regard to the attack against the headquarters of FEDECAMARAS in February 2008, the Government indicates that on 6 and 10 May 2010 the auxiliary judicial bodies detained the two persons charged with committing the alleged acts, who are currently in detention. With regard to the alleged acts that occurred in May and November 2007 (the attack against the headquarters of FEDECAMARAS) the corresponding authority, in this case the Office of the Prosecutor General of the Republic, informed the Labour and Social Security Office that it had not received any complaint or information to launch an investigation into any act that had occurred at the headquarters of the employers’ organization during the year 2007. The Committee invites FEDECAMARAS to bring criminal charges for the attack against its headquarters in 2007.

With regard to the alleged “provisions of the Penal Code and other legislation which tend to restrict the exercise of the right to demonstrate and the right to strike and which criminalize legitimate trade union activities”, the Government affirms that the National Constitution and the law set forth the right of all men and women workers in the public and private sectors to strike in accordance with the conditions established by the law, which regulate the exercise thereof and protect workers against acts of anti-union discrimination (dismissals, etc.). The Basic Labour Act establishes the procedure to be followed to call and hold a strike, where applicable and when such stoppages do not give rise to irreversible damages to the population or to institutions (section 496).

With reference to the provisions of the Venezuelan Penal Code, and particularly sections 357 and 360, the Government indicates that these provisions govern illicit and unlawful conduct prejudicing the safety of the means of transport and communication of the Venezuelan population, thereby complying with the obligation of the State to protect the guarantees and rights of the citizens of the country. Accordingly, in no case do these provisions refer to the application of penalties or sanctions for demonstrations or peaceful activities, but on the contrary govern illicit and unlawful conduct. The types of conduct classified in these provisions as illicit are also considered to be crimes in the penal legislation in many countries at the global level, with the imposition of penalties and sanctions against those committing crimes against means of transport and communication. Consequently, the establishment of these crimes in the Penal Code, far from restricting the right to strike and to peaceful demonstration, protects public security and the guarantees of men and women citizens. For these reasons, the full exercise in the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela of the right to strike and to peaceful demonstration is endorsed once again and in no case do there exist restrictions on these rights, nor in particular are legitimate trade union activities criminalized.

With reference to the laws that are criticized, the Government states that the Basic Act on Security and Defence provides that national security and defence are the competence and responsibility of the State and that the necessary measures for that purpose are of a permanent nature. Similarly, all Venezuelan individuals and associations, wherever they may be, are also responsible for the security and defence of the Republic. Furthermore, the very recent Act to defend the access of persons to goods and services is intended for the defence, protection and safeguard of individual and collective rights relating to the access of persons to goods and services for the satisfaction of their needs.

The Government adds that the Special Peoples' Defence Act against hoarding, speculation, boycotts and any conduct which effects the consumption of food or products subject to price controls (LECAEB) is intended to restrict speculation by the enterprise sector, which increases the cost of food and other goods and services under pretexts which are not related to the current economic situation. Accordingly, the Act is intended to combat hoarding, speculation, boycotts and any other conduct which prejudices the food security of Venezuelan citizens. The principal objective of the Act consists of the establishment of mechanisms for the defence of the people against such illegal acts and against conduct which is prejudicial to the consumption of food and products subject to price controls, which are considered contrary to the food security and the social peace of the Venezuela people. Finally, in October 2000, various sections of the Venezuelan Penal Code were amended: sections 358–359 refer to the prohibition upon blocking and/or damaging thoroughfares and means of transport and establish the corresponding sentences and penalties for committing such crimes and violations of the legal provisions.

According to the Government, by virtue of the above considerations, it is clear that the spirit and objective of these provisions is far from criminalizing the claims of men and women workers and restricting the broad constitutional right to strike which exists in the country, and that they are intended to regulate and prohibit unlawful conduct, establishing the respective offences, procedures and penalties. All of this is intended to guarantee social peace, justice and the rights and guarantees of the Venezuelan people.

With regard to the detention of workers who were engaged in alleged protests against the Special Act respecting municipal authorities, the Government indicates that on 26 August 2009, a number of men and women workers from the metropolitan town hall engaged in protest action with the intention of lodging an appeal for amparo (the protection of constitutional rights) with the Supreme Court of Justice (TSJ) against the Special Act respecting municipal authorities at two levels of the metropolitan area, which was subsequently approved by the National Assembly. During the course of the protests, 11 of the workers were detained for causing, according to the investigations of the Office of the Public Prosecutor, "breaches of public order and injuries to a metropolitan police officer (PM)". The following were detained: Carlos Lozada Villegas, Abello Álvarez, Omar Rodríguez, Gustavo Aponte, Gerardo Jesús Gonzales, Xisto Antonio Gomez, Jaer Antonio Pulido, Yumar Oscar Figueroa, Alexander Ronald, Viña Figueroa and Lixido José Solarte. Subsequently, during the preliminary hearing, the 72nd Public Prosecutor's Office of the Metropolitan Area of Caracas ordered the 11 detained workers to be retained in custody, charging them, on the one hand, for certain of them, of the alleged crime of serious injury, resistance to authority and obstruction of the public thoroughfare, set out in the Venezuelan Penal Code, and for others, offences against systems based on information technology, under the Special Act on information technology crimes. The 50th Tribunal of the Metropolitan Area of Caracas found the prosecutor's charges receivable, approved the application for judicial custody and ordered the detention of those charged until the final prosecution within the time limits set out in the Basic Code on Penal Procedure. Finally, after the necessary procedures had been followed, on 29 October 2009, the 11 workers of the metropolitan town hall who had been detained for various alleged crimes set out in the national legislation were released. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the authorities definitively renounced the charges against these trade union members.

With reference to the situation of certain radio and television stations and the procedure followed by the National Telecommunications Commission (CONATEL), the Government states that the radio-electric spectrum is the public property of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela, in accordance with the Constitution and the Basic Act on Telecommunications. The use of the spectrum is subject to the granting of the respective concession by CONATEL, an institution which grants a specific person a right (which cannot be ceded or transferred and is for a limited period of time) to use and exploit a specific portion of the spectrum, subject to compliance with the requirements set out in the Constitution and the Basic Act referred to above. Article 58 of the Constitution provides that communication is free and pluralistic, and involves the duties and responsibilities set out by law. Accordingly, everyone is entitled to appropriate, truthful and impartial information without censorship in accordance with the constitutional principles. The Basic Act on Telecommunications also sets out the principles governing telecommunications with a view to guaranteeing the right to communication of all citizens in the country. The Government adds that CONATEL is responsible for the administration, regulation, ordered use and supervision of the radio-electric spectrum and that its function is to make possible the effective, efficient and peaceful use of telecommunications resources, as well as ensuring compliance with the obligations deriving from this service. For this purpose, it makes use of the procedure of administrative authorization, which is granted for the establishment and exploitation of networks and for the provision of telecommunication services to those complying with the requirements and conditions established by CONATEL for such purposes. Accordingly, CONATEL is the institution which grants approval and concessions to engage in telecommunication activities which make use of the radio-electric spectrum. This all involves compliance with a series of essential requirements for the provision of an appropriate service and the proper establishment or exploitation of a network, including the obligation to apply to CONATEL for the corresponding administrative authorization. If this is not done, the penalties which may be applied for violations and offences set out in the Basic Act on Telecommunications are public warning, fines, withdrawal of administrative authorization (or a concession), the cessation of clandestine activities, prohibition of operation, the decommissioning of materials and equipment used for the activity or imprisonment, depending on the violation committed, and in compliance with the procedure for the determination of such violations. Such procedures may be instigated automatically, upon denunciation or at the initiative of the institution, which is empowered to apply penalties in accordance with the principles of legality, impartiality, rationality and proportionality. It should also be emphasized that CONATEL launched a procedure for the review of 240 means of telecommunication and established a period for those operators of radio-electric media to bring their data up to date with the institution and/or to remedy various irregularities which had appeared. When the time period had elapsed and the procedure was completed, CONATEL proceeded to revoke, withdraw or not to renew broadcasting permits for certain radio and television channels, and more specifically for 34 media which either had not updated the data submitted to the institution or for which administrative irregularities had emerged such as: the death of the holder of the transmission licence, the renunciation of the previous licence holder, the operating permit was no longer valid or notification that the change in ownership of the licence was invalid, or they had committed various violations or breaches of the respective laws. Accordingly, the administrative procedures followed by the institution were a consequence of the failure to comply with the obligations and requirements set out in national law for the appropriate use of the national radio-electric spectrum and telecommunication services. According to the Government, the measures adopted by CONATEL, in addition to being in accordance with the law and the legally established procedures, are intended to guarantee the right of the Venezuelan people to appropriate, truthful and impartial information.

In general, the Committee deplores the high number of assassinations of trade union leaders and members and expresses its deep concern at this situation and at the fact that the figures on the number of alleged assassinations provided by trade union organizations differ considerably from those emerging from the information provided by the Government. The Committee takes due note of the Government's indication that those responsible are "hired killers" and are involved in organized crime. It also notes the identification and detention of a number of those responsible, and the establishment of a Working Group on violence in the construction sector and of a Special Commission at the request of the UNT. Nevertheless, the Committee is bound to emphasize that it is the responsibility of the Government to guarantee the life and safety of all trade union leaders. The overall situation described by the trade union organizations also includes allegations of the repression of demonstrations, detentions, death threats and many anti-union dismissals, as well as restrictions on the right to strike and individual liberty based on the application of a series of laws, ranging from the Penal Code to other laws which are intended to guarantee the right of persons to have access to goods and services, to combat hoarding, to defend agricultural and food sovereignty, and laws respecting products of primary necessity or those subject to price controls. The Committee observes that the comments of the trade union organizations also refer to a very high number of probationary measures involving the need to report regularly to the judicial authorities, which have an intimidating effect on the exercise of trade union rights.

The Committee also observes with deep concern that the principal employers' federation, FEDECAMARAS, has reported serious acts of violence against four of its leaders, including its President and a member of the Governing Body of the ILO, who was hit by several bullets (according to the Government, two of those presumed to be responsible have been detained, and three others have been identified, who are members of a criminal gang engaged in kidnapping), it has also reported acts of violence against its headquarters, including measures which, according to the allegations, are discriminatory against the property of certain of its leaders, including cases of arbitrary expropriation, and the closure of radio and television stations belonging to certain of them, or which were used by employers' organizations, and the criminal prosecution of employers' leaders. The Committee believes that there are sufficient elements to support the allegation of intimidation. The Committee requests the Government to guarantee the right to life and safety of employers' leaders and the exercise of their civil liberties, including the right of expression, and to ensure that they are not the victims of discrimination in their property as a result of their status as employers' leaders or their activities as such.

The Committee notes that the Government provides a detailed description of the legislation respecting the requirement to report regularly to the judicial authorities (probationary judicial measures) and the various laws which, according to the allegations are used for the detention of leaders or to restrict the right to demonstration and the right to strike. It also notes that, according to the Government, the high number of cases reported (of assassination or other matters, such as probationary judicial measures restricting their freedom) are unfounded and have not been documented by the trade union organizations.

The Committee considers that, in view of their gravity, it is the responsibility of the Government in respect of the matters referred to above, to provide detailed information on each and every assassination of trade union members (the numbers, victims, those responsible, prosecutions, the state of the investigations, the detention of those responsible and the sentences applied), the number of probationary judicial measures ordered restricting the freedom of trade unionists and employers' leaders, and the persons detained, with an explanation of the specific reasons for them, without prejudice to the consultation by the Government in this task of workers' and employers' organizations. In the view of the Committee, it is also necessary for these issues relating to fundamental human rights to be examined by the tripartite partners at the national level with the most representative organizations of workers and employers. In this respect, the Committee regrets that, despite the call that has been made for years for the establishment of a national tripartite committee with the most representative organizations for the examination of issues affecting them directly, the Government is denying the national social partners the opportunity to find solutions to the current problems through dialogue with the Government. The Committee urges the Government to create a national tripartite committee on situations of violence and the violation of the fundamental rights of trade unionists and employers' organizations and their leaders, including the review of the penal provisions (and their application) criticized by the trade union organizations, and to provide information in this respect.

The Committee wishes to refer to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards of the International Labour Conference in 2010, which read as follows:

The Committee [on the Application of Standards] recalled that the rights of workers' and employers' organizations could only be enjoyed in a climate of absolute respect for human rights, without exception. Recalling that trade union rights and freedom of association could not exist in the absence of full guarantees of civil liberties, in particular of freedom of speech, assembly and movement, the Committee emphasized that respect for these rights implied that both workers' and employers' organizations had to be able to exercise their activities in a climate free of fear, threats and violence and that the ultimate responsibility in that regard lay with the Government. The Committee observed in that respect that the employers in FEDECAMARAS felt intimidated by the actions and verbal aggression of the authorities.

The Committee requests the Government to ensure that the right to life and security of the person, the right to demonstrate and the right to freedom of expression are guaranteed, and to ensure that the probationary system referred to above is not used for the purpose of controlling and intimidating trade union and employers' leaders. The Committee further requests the Government to ensure that trade union rights, such as the right to strike, are not restricted through the use of ambiguous legal provisions claiming to defend other constitutional rights. The Committee requests the Government to evaluate with the most representative organizations of workers and employers the impact of such provisions on their rights and those of their leaders, and to provide information on this matter.

Legislative issues

The Committee recalls that it previously emphasized the need to adopt the Bill to amend the Basic Labour Act so as to eliminate the restrictions placed on the exercise of the rights granted by the Convention to workers' and employers' organizations. On this issue, the Committee previously made the following comments:

The Committee previously noted that a Bill to amend the Basic Labour Act took account of the requests for amendment that it had made on the following points: (1) it deletes sections 408 and 409 (over-detailed enumeration of the mandatory functions and purposes of workers' and employers' organizations); (2) it reduces from ten to five years the required period of residence before a foreign worker may hold office in an executive body of a trade union organization (it should be noted that the new Regulations of the Basic Labour Act establish that trade union statutes may provide for the election of foreign nationals as trade union leaders); (3) it reduces from 100 to 40 the number of workers required to establish a trade union of independent workers; (4) it reduces from ten to four the number of employers required to establish an employers' organization; (5) it provides that the technical cooperation and logistical support of the electoral authority (the National Electoral Council) for the organization of elections to executive bodies of trade unions shall be provided only where so requested by the trade union organizations in accordance with the provisions of their statutes, and that elections held without the participation of the CNE and which comply with the statutes of the trade unions concerned shall have full legal effect once the corresponding reports are submitted to the appropriate labour inspectorate (this is addressed further below). The Committee also noted that the Bill provided that "in accordance with the constitutional principle of democratic changeover, the executive board of a trade union organization shall discharge its functions during the period established by the statutes of the organization, but in no case may a period in excess of three years be established". Although the Government provided information indicating that trade union leaders are re-elected in practice, the Committee hoped that the legislative authority would include in the Bill a provision explicitly allowing the re-election of trade union leaders;

The Committee of Experts notes that the Conference Committee, after hearing the Government representative indicate that in May 2009 a new process of consultations had been commenced on the draft Basic Labour Act, adopted the following conclusion:

The Committee regretted the Government's apparent lack of political will to pursue the adoption of the Bill in question and the lack of progress despite visits by several ILO missions to the country.

With regard to the "need to adopt the Bill to amend the Basic Labour Act", the Government indicates that an intense process of consultation has been held on the reform of the Basic Labour Act and its most relevant aspects, with the holding of discussions and meetings with practically all the sectors of the national economy, including workers' and employers' organizations. The Integral Social Development Commission of the National Assembly is currently reviewing the observations and proposals made by public institutions and the social partners. The Bill to amend the Basic Labour Act is now ready for its second reading by the National Assembly in accordance with the legislative agenda. The Bill has been broadly discussed and debated, as part of the process of street-level parliamentarianism developed by the Venezuelan State through the National Assembly, through which it is intended that workers' and employers' and their representative organizations, as well as all men and women citizens and social institutions interested, can make proposals and raise issues to enrich this legislative initiative, which will constitute a major advance in social, labour and representative rights for the men and women workers in the country and which therefore needs to attain the highest possible level of consensus. The Government emphasizes that the provisions criticized by the ILO supervisory bodies relate to the Basic Labour Act which entered into force in 1991 and have been criticized by the International Labour Conference since 1992. The Government affirms that it fully agrees that the provisions criticized have to be amended on the occasion of the reform of the Basic Labour Act, and that there exists full consensus between the national Government, legislators and workers' and employers' organizations for the amendment of those provisions. Furthermore, none of those provisions are applied, nor have they resulted in any restriction on the exercise of freedom of association.

Under these circumstances, the Committee regrets that for over nine years the Bill to amend the Basic Labour Act has still not been adopted by the Legislative Assembly, despite enjoying tripartite consensus. Taking into account the significance of the restrictions which remain in the legislation in relation to freedom of association and the freedom to organize, the Committee once again urges the Government to take measures to accelerate the examination by the Legislative Assembly of the Bill to amend the Basic Labour Act.

With regard to the Committee's comment on "the need for the National Electoral Council (CNE) ... to cease interfering in trade union elections and to no longer be empowered to annul them, and the need for the statute for the election of the executive bodies of national (trade union) organizations ... to be amended or repealed", the Government reiterates that in 2009, the standards of the CNE were amended to bring them into line with the recommendations of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. In accordance with the new standards of 2009, the role of the CNE was limited to: (i) receiving previously from the trade union organization the electoral timetable and the provisions governing it, in accordance with its statutes; (ii) offering those trade union organizations which voluntarily request it, and in full respect for their autonomy, technical advice on the holding of their elections; and (iii) examining cases of complaints concerning the internal electoral process by worker members, once the channels of recourse established by their statutes have been exhausted.

The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the CNE, for the purposes of offering technical advice and logistical support, where it is so requested, examines and determines "appeals lodged against acts, omissions and abstentions from the electoral board, respecting the electoral process of trade union organizations" (clause 9 of the standards on technical advice and logistical support in relation to trade union elections). The Government adds that the electoral board is the body in the trade union responsible for organizing and directing the process for the election of the representatives of the trade union organization and that the CNE only acts as a body to which the members of the trade union can turn if they have any complaint against the actions of the electoral board. The Government therefore emphasizes that the CNE does not interfere in trade union elections. Notwithstanding the above, the Government indicates that a communication was recently addressed to the President of the CNE informing it of the comments of the Committee of Experts in relation to the new standards on technical assistance and logistical support in relation to trade union elections.

The Committee observes that the Committee on Freedom of Association has continued to examine cases concerning interference by the CNE in trade union elections. The Committee of Experts observes that the 2009 standards of the CNE, although providing that the intervention of the CNE in trade union procedures in terms of technical assistance is voluntary, continue empowering this body, which is not a judicial body, to examine complaints and appeals by "members of the trade union" relating to trade union elections, thereby facilitating interference of all types to impede the validity of the trade union elections. It therefore requests the Government to take measures so that the standards in force provide that appeals respecting trade union elections are determined by the judicial authorities and for the standards in force not to require, as requested by one of the trade union organizations which has made comments, the publication in the Electoral Gazette of the results of trade union elections as a requirement for their recognition, nor the requirement to provide the electoral timetable to the CNE. The Committee also recalls that, when the new Constitution of the Republic was adopted, trade union organizations were required to amend their statutes so as to recognize the intervention of the CNE in their elections. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the organizations which at the time had to change their statutes to accept the participation of the CNE in the holding of their elections are obliged to submit to the CNE.

Other legislative issues

The Committee previously noted the Government's statements concerning certain legislative issues, and particularly the possibility of compulsory arbitration in certain public services that are not essential in the strict sense of the term (section 152 of the Regulations of the Basic Labour Act). The Committee previously requested the Government to supplement its statements by indicating the cases in which arbitration had been imposed.

With regard to the scope of the Regulations of the Basic Labour Act in relation to compulsory arbitration in basic and strategic services, the Government indicates that the right to strike is fully protected in Venezuelan law. Nevertheless, to prevent the exercise of the right to strike by workers causing irreparable damage to the population and to institutions, it is established that the indispensable minimum services that have to be maintained on the occasion of stoppages of activities by workers have to be determined beforehand. The determination of minimum services is an indispensable requirement for the exercise of the right to strike and has to be agreed between the parties, workers and employers, in accordance with the provisions of the national legislation. Nevertheless, the Government adds that it has been the reiterated practice of employers, when workers exercise their right to strike, to refuse to reach agreement on the minimum indispensable services in a conciliatory manner, with a view to delaying or preventing the calling of the strike by the workers. It is precisely to prevent this indispensable procedure becoming an obstacle to the exercise by workers of their right to strike that compulsory arbitration is provided for only in those cases in which all the possibilities of reaching agreement between the workers and employers have been exhausted. In such cases, the People's Ministry for Labour and Social Security undertakes a technical assessment of the enterprise or establishment in which the workers are to initiate the stoppage, reviews the claims made by workers and employers and, by ministerial decision, determines the indispensable minimum services which may not be stopped on the occasion of the strike. The Committee emphasizes that, in the case of disagreement between the parties, it should be an independent body that enjoys the confidence of the parties or the judicial authorities which determine the minimum services, particularly in cases of strikes in public enterprises or institutions, and it requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the legislation in accordance with this principle, particularly in the public sector.

Finally, with regard to the Committee's comment on the resolution of the Ministry of Labour of 3 February 2005 giving trade union organizations 30 days to provide information on their administration and the register of their members in a form that includes each worker's full identity, place of residence and signature (an issue criticized by the ITUC for years), the Committee previously emphasized that the confidentiality of trade union membership should be ensured. It recalls that it may be appropriate to develop a code of conduct with trade union organizations covering the conditions in which data on their members are to be provided, and making use of appropriate techniques for the use of personal data which guarantee absolute confidentiality. The Committee noted in its previous observation the Government's statement that it has guaranteed the privacy of data, has not been informed of the existence of cases of abuse and that there have not been any complaints.

The Committee notes the Government's statement in its report that the resolution referred to is based on section 430 of the Basic Labour Act, which establishes the obligation for organizations to provide to the competent body on an annual basis a report on its administration and the list of its members, all for the purpose of demonstrating the number of members of the trade union organization and accordingly its representative status. As there were trade union organizations which were not in compliance with the obligations set out by these provisions, the People's Ministry for Labour and Social Security drew attention to the need to give effect to these provisions guaranteeing trade union representativeness contained in the Basic Labour Act. This in turn enables the Ministry to provide the respective labour statistics annually to the various bodies of the public authorities, draw up its report and indicate the number of trade union organizations established and the number of men and women workers covered by the respective protection. The Committee notes the Government's statement concerning its obligations in relation to statistics, but once again emphasizes that the obligation of trade unions to provide the list of their members to the Ministry of Labour must be accompanied by sufficient guarantees of confidentiality. It requests the Government to adopt measures in line with the indications in its previous observation.

Shortcomings in social dialogue

In successive observations in recent years, the Committee has identified considerable shortcomings in social dialogue. The ITUC, the CTV, the General Confederation of Venezuelan Workers (CGT) and FEDECAMARAS indicated that the authorities only hold formal consultations, without the intention of taking into account the views of the parties consulted, and that there is no authentic dialogue. The Committee observes that in its 2009 comments the ITUC indicated that the absence of dialogue between the Government and trade union organizations meant that workers had little or no participation in the nationalization of enterprises in the steel and cement sectors. According to the ITUC, the Government is promoting "parallel" trade unionism at all levels, with emphasis on the establishment of a new trade union confederation (the Bolivarian Socialist Workers Force) as a counterweight to organizations that are not close to the policies of the Ministry of Labour or which oppose the Government. This "parallelism" has given rise to a high number of trade unions with a low number of workers covered by collective agreements, with the result that the proportion of workers covered by collective bargaining has continued to decline in relation to previous years. The lack of social dialogue and tripartite meetings in the public sector is a recurrent practice, and 243 collective contracts in the sector have not been signed.

The CTV indicated in 2009 that the national executive authorities do not recognize trade union organizations which are not close to them and disregard federations in the health and education sectors, thereby creating an obstacle to collective bargaining or interfering with it.

FEDECAMARAS emphasized in 2009 the absence of social dialogue and of bipartite or tripartite consultations by the Government and the adoption without previous consultation of important laws which affect the interests of workers and employers, despite the principle of participatory democracy enshrined in the law. In its view, this is giving rise to numerous controls, legal barriers for the productive sector and new taxes which are endangering the productive sector and employers' organizations. It adds that the Government has still not convened the National Tripartite Commission envisaged in the Basic Labour Act for the determination of minimum wages, which are established by the Government without due consultation with any sector. With reference to the Employers' delegation to the Conference, FEDECAMARAS affirms that the Government is promoting the parallelism of employers' organizations by encouraging and financing those which are close to it, and that it imposed the inclusion as Employers' technical advisers of representatives of CONFAGAN, the Venezuelan Federation of Small, Medium and Artisanal Industries (FEDEINDUSTRIA) and EMPREVEN, which follow government policy and are not representative, despite the reports of the Credentials Committee of the International Labour Conference on objections concerning the nomination of the Employers' delegation of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela.

In its 2010 comments, the ITUC reiterates the absence of social dialogue and the refusal of the authorities to establish tripartite dialogue machinery.

The Committee previously noted the Government's indications in 2009 that: (i) social dialogue has been broad and inclusive; the national, regional and local governments have held innumerable meetings and discussions with the participation of various members and leaders of the different employers' and workers' organizations which form part of the life in the country; the confederations and federations of employers and workers of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela have been convened to national dialogue round tables and their comments and observations have been sought on different types of subjects, which has given rise to an inclusive, participative and productive exchange with all the social actors; (ii) the various types of action undertaken by the Government have shown its interest, unequivocal action and will to promote dialogue and seek agreement with employers, workers and the productive sectors of the population, without the exclusion of or discrimination against any organization or sectoral association, through dialogue that has been broad and inclusive; (iii) in addition, the Government has maintained and continues to maintain dialogue and negotiations with the sectors of small and medium-sized enterprises, which have traditionally been excluded from political, economic and social decisions, which were previously undertaken only by a group of employers or organizations within a highly monopolistic and oligarchic structure subordinated to transnational interests; (iv) emphasis needs to be placed on the innumerable attempts by the national, regional and local executive authorities to establish discussion round tables for economic and social decision-making, which have been repeatedly rejected in view of the lack of readiness and will of certain employers' sectors; (v) as a result of this social dialogue, in the first half of 2009, a total of 255 collective labour agreements were approved, covering 537,332 workers in various sectors; (vi) similarly, in 2008, over 600 new trade union organizations were established freely and democratically, while in the first half of 2009 a total of 152 have been established, thereby rebutting any argument claiming to insinuate violations of freedom of association in the context of Convention No. 87 (these figures have been revised upwards in the Government's information provided in 2010 in the context of the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98)); (vii) the existence of isolated cases, which have been presented as generalized and inappropriate conduct by the Government, of alleged violations of freedom of association are fabrications presented out of context, and fail to take a comprehensive view of all the respective information; (viii) it is necessary to reiterate that the Venezuelan State guarantees, respects and protects the exercise of freedom of association at both the individual and collective levels, and consequently guarantees political and ideological freedom; (ix) the national Government, on 26 May 2009, following the recommendations of the ILO supervisory bodies in relation to the determination of objective and verifiable criteria with regard to representativeness, convened a meeting which was attended by representatives of FEDECAMARAS, EMPREVEN, CONFAGAN and FEDEINDUSTRIA, with a view to the adoption of positive measures to determine the level of representativeness and the membership of employers' organizations, chambers of commerce, industry, agriculture and any other branch; (x) subsequently, on 30 June 2009, a second meeting was held with the representatives of the Ministry and of the employers' organizations referred to above with a view to continuing the discussions of aspects relating to the determination of criteria of representativeness; no representative of FEDECAMARAS attended this meeting; and (xi) the People's Ministry for Labour and Social Security is currently engaged in a process of broad consultation with a view to the amendment of section 11 of the Social Security Act, with a view to extending maternity and paternity benefits, and invitations were sent to the employers' organizations referred to above with a view to their commenting on the leave provisions of the above Act; during these meetings, the organizations referred to above engaged in an open dialogue.

The Committee notes the 2010 comments of FEDECAMARAS concerning social dialogue, indicating that the situation described in 2009 has worsened, particularly through the adoption of numerous laws without consultation which, among other matters, promote forms of "social ownership", the compulsory purchase of properties by the State, forced expropriation, the forced cession of urban and rural properties, the violation of the separation of powers in the administration of justice, the nationalization of enterprises, including in the oil sector, discriminatory public contracts, restrictions on banking through greater state control, the promotion of the communal economic system and other laws in relation to employment guarantees. These laws, on which FEDECAMARAS was not consulted, seriously affect the interests of employers, apply a more ideological approach, increase control of civil society and establish greater centralization.

The Committee notes that, in its 2010 comments, the ITUC reiterates its views concerning the absence of social dialogue and the refusal of the authorities to establish tripartite dialogue machinery.

The Committee notes the Government's statement in its present report that, in addition to meetings with the employers' organizations of the country, including FEDECAMARAS, concerning the determination of criteria of representativeness and respecting the Social Security Act, various meetings were also held prior to the 99th session of the International Labour Conference, in which the participants in the discussion included representatives of the national Government and various employers' organizations, such as EMPREVEN, FEDEINDUSTRIA, CONFAGAN, COBOIEM and FEDECAMARAS. Meetings have also been held between the national executive authorities and employers on various subjects of national interest, such as the cost and production of foodstuffs and the consumption of electricity, as well as various meetings with a view to developing relations of confidence between the Government and the private sector and hearing the proposals of employers and producers in the country. The Government adds that tripartite dialogue exists in the occupational safety and health sector, including a tripartite body.

The Government adds that, with a view to achieving the sovereignty of the country in the fields of agricultural and food production, industry and sustainable development, and moreover in accordance with the recommendations and guidance of international bodies, solidarity financing policies and programmes are being implemented, with low interest rates, intended for enterprises, irrespective of the organization of which they are members, as well as for independent entrepreneurs and producers.

The Government also indicates that, through the establishment of the Bicentenary Fund, the national Government is encouraging strategies to make progress in the selective replacement of imports and the stimulation of the export sector in the country, through joint action with men and women workers, employers in the productive sector, and in close coordination with the leaders, mayors and communal governments of the people's authorities, with the firm intention of meeting the fundamental needs of the Venezuelan people.

The Government further notes that the socialist productive round tables initiated by the national executive authorities in January 2010 included the participation of representatives of all productive sectors, social production enterprises, cooperatives, micro-, small, medium and large enterprises, many of which are members of FEDECAMARAS, which confirms the participation of this employers' organization in the inclusive, constructive and productive social dialogue promoted by the national Government. In January 2010, the People's Ministry for Labour and Social Security sent communications to employers' organizations, including FEDECAMARAS, and to workers' organizations, seeking views concerning the fixing of the national minimum wage for the current year of 2010. These organizations responded to the requests and sent their observations on the national minimum wage to the Office for Labour and Social Security. The national executive authorities, taking into the account the considerations of employers' and workers' organizations, and of the respective agencies, decreed the increase in the national minimum wage by 25 per cent for the year 2010. On various occasions, communications have been sent to workers' organizations, including the CTV, CODESA, CGT, CUTV and UNT, and employers' organizations, including FEDECAMARAS, EMPREVEN, FEDEINDUSTRIA and CONFAGAN, and to various national agencies, with a view to obtaining their views concerning the fixing of the national minimum wage. The Government also provides updated statistical data on the coverage of collective bargaining in the public and private sectors, which are reflected in detail in the observation on Convention No. 98.

The Government therefore expresses concern at the Committee's continued indication "that the Government has not promoted the conditions for social dialogue in the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela with the most representative organization". This is, firstly, because the Government has indicated on innumerable occasions that there does not exist one single and exclusive most representative organization of employers, and secondly, because the national Government has made every relevant effort for the construction, promotion and development of much broader social dialogue, with the intervention of all the most representative organizations of employers and workers, and not a single organization, as it would appear that it is the intention to impose.

The national Government also indicates that it does not engage in acts of favouritism towards any organization or group in the country, as denounced without justification to the ILO. The Government favours the inclusion of all actors in the development of the socio-economic life of the country, in which there has always been an important trade union movement, of both employers and workers, alongside the two organizations which monopolized representation for decades. There are workers' organizations, such as the Single Central Organization of Workers of Venezuela (CUTV), which dates from the 1960s, and employers' organizations, such as FEDEINDUSTRIA, which was founded 38 years ago, and which are also representative in the country.

The Government emphasizes that it will not apply the criterion according to which a sole organization assumes exclusive representativeness, thereby conditioning the destiny and participation of all other organizations which are also representative in the various sectors of the economy in the country. Moreover, such a criterion does not correspond with the fundamental principles of the ILO, nor with social justice or the common good.

Furthermore, in its 2010 report, the Committee of Experts "deplores the fact that there has been no follow-up to the high-level mission of 2006". In this respect, the Government refers to a communication dated 8 September 2009 sent to the ILO with a detailed report of the action taken on each of the recommendations made by the mission in 2006.

The Committee concludes that, although the Government has held some consultations with FEDECAMARAS (or with member employers or organizations) or has invited it to meetings (concerning the determination of the criteria of representativeness, the Social Security Act, meetings for the determination of the composition of employers in the ILO Conference and on minimum wages) with employers or organizations affiliated to the above organization, the Government has not consulted it, or at least does not deny FEDECAMARAS' allegations, concerning a whole series of vital laws which directly affect the rights of employers and which pursue fundamental changes in the social and productive system and place limitations on the private sector. The Committee also observes that the comments of the trade union organizations do not share the Government's vision concerning the existence of true dialogue, and that it is not shared by FEDECAMARAS either. In particular, the Committee has not received information allowing it to note efforts by the authorities to achieve in so far as possible to joint solutions with the most representative workers' and employers' organizations on matters that directly affect them.

The Committee notes with regret, with reference to certain of its previous requests and those of the Conference Committee and the Committee on Freedom of Association, that the National Tripartite Commission on minimum wages envisaged in the Basic Labour Act has not been established and that a national forum for social dialogue has not been created in accordance with ILO principles with a tripartite composition and which respects in its membership the representative status of workers' organizations. The Committee further observes that the Government has repeatedly disregarded the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in relation to the important problems encountered by employers and their organizations, in which it requested direct dialogue with this organization, and more specifically its recommendation urging the Government to establish in the country a high-level joint national commission (Government–FEDECAMARAS) assisted by the ILO to examine each and every one of the allegations and matters that are pending so that such problems can be resolved through direct dialogue. As it is not a complex or costly measure, the Committee concludes that the Government is still failing to promote the conditions for social dialogue in the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela with the most representative organization of employers. The Committee emphasizes the conclusions of the Conference Committee in 2009 in which it observed that the Government was continuing to ignore its urgent calls to promote meaningful dialogue with the most representative social partners and it called on the Government to intensify social dialogue with the representative organizations of workers and employers, including FEDECAMARAS, and to ensure that this organization was not marginalized in respect of all matters of concern to it. In 2009, the Conference Committee requested follow-up action to the 2006 high-level mission to assist the Government and the social partners to improve social dialogue, including through the creation of a national tripartite committee, and to resolve all of the outstanding matters brought before the supervisory bodies. The Committee deplores the fact that this tripartite committee has not been established and that there has been no conclusive progress on the determination of the criteria of representativeness. The Committee recalls that the Government may request ILO assistance for determining the criteria of representativeness in accordance with the principles of the Convention.

The Committee, noting that there are still no structured bodies for tripartite social dialogue, once again emphasizes the importance that should be attached to full and frank consultation without hindrance on any questions or proposed legislation affecting trade union rights and that it is essential that the introduction of draft legislation affecting collective bargaining or conditions of employment should be preceded by full and detailed consultations with the independent and most representative workers' and employers' organizations. The Committee also requests the Government to ensure that any legislation adopted concerning labour, social and economic issues which affects workers, employers and their organizations should be the subject of real in-depth consultations with the independent and most representative employers' and workers' organizations, and that sufficient efforts are being made, in so far as possible, to reach joint solutions, since this is the cornerstone of dialogue.

The Committee once again invites the Government to request the technical assistance of the ILO for the establishment of the dialogue bodies mentioned above. In this context, the Committee emphasizes once again that it is important, taking into account the allegations of discrimination against FEDECAMARAS, the CTV and their member organizations, including the establishment or promotion of organizations or enterprises close to the regime, that the Government is guided exclusively by criteria of representativeness in its dialogue and relations with workers' and employers' organizations, and that it refrains from any form of interference and complies with Article 3 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any developments in social dialogue and its outcome, and it strongly hopes that it will be in a position to note progress in the near future.

The Committee notes that the Government denies the allegations concerning favouritism in relation to certain workers' and employers' organizations. The Committee indicated previously that it is also important, in relation to social dialogue, for an independent investigation to be conducted into the allegations concerning the promotion by the authorities of parallel organizations of workers and employers that are close to the Government, and of favouritism and partiality in relation to such organizations. The Committee requests the Government to take steps necessary for this investigation to be conducted and to provide information on this matter.

Furthermore, the Committee regretted previously that the former President of FEDECAMARAS, Carlos Fernández, is still covered by an arrest warrant which prevents his return to the country without fear of reprisals. The Committee notes the Government's extensive statements in its report, which basically reiterate those made previously. The Committee will not re-examine this issue in substance, which moreover has also been addressed by the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Committee therefore reiterates its previous conclusions.

Finally, the Committee once again emphasizes the importance of the Government accepting the ILO mission requested by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards and expresses the firm hope that the Government will be able to provide information on tangible and concrete progress on the issues that have been raised.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1968)

The Committee takes note of the observations submitted by the following trade union organizations: (1) the Confederation of Workers of Venezuela (CTV), dated 28 August 2009, referring to the Government's refusal to discuss collective labour agreements with the workers in certain sectors (health, courts, petroleum, cement, electricity, public sector, etc.); (2) the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 24 August 2010, referring to practices that undermine collective bargaining, such as unwarranted delays in bargaining talks in both the public and the private sectors and collective bargaining violations in various enterprises and sectors in the country; (3) the Independent Trade Union Alliance (ASI), dated 31 August 2010, likewise referring to delays in the discussion of collective agreements and the absence of social dialogue, and to the failure to renew collective agreements, whose expiry dates back many years, a yearly decrease in the number of collective agreements in comparison to the increasing number of workers and trade unions, the cancellation of one negotiated collective agreement to impose another in its stead, and the requirement that in order to initiate the collective bargaining process, trade union executive committees must be approved by the National Electoral Council (CNE); and (4) the Single National Union of Public Employees of the Venezuelan Corporation of Guayana (SUNEP-CVG), dated 10 November 2010. The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments made by the CSI, the CTV and the ASI.

Article 4 of the Convention. Right to collective bargaining. In its previous comments, in view of the ITUC's observation that the collective bargaining processes in various sectors had been at a standstill since 2006 (pointing out that 243 collective agreement had not been signed and more than 3,500 had not been discussed), the Committee requested the Government to send its observations on the comments made by the ITUC on the situation of collective bargaining, and to provide information on the cases in which two trade union organizations claimed to be the most representative, and on the administrative decisions taken by the labour authority in accordance with the provisions on trade union referendums, and to send the texts of those provisions.

As regards the cases in which two trade union organizations claimed to be the most representative, the Committee notes the information supplied by the Government to the effect that in order to determine which of two trade union organizations or groups of trade union organizations really represents the majority of the workers for the purposes of collective bargaining, the workers concerned are consulted directly by means of a trade union referendum, which establishes which one has the majority support of the workers. The Committee further notes that the Government cites the occurrence at the Polar Brewery as an example, but has not sent the texts of the administrative decisions rendered by the labour authority pursuant to the provisions on trade union referendums. Consequently, the Committee again requests the Government to provide the texts of the administrative decisions rendered by the labour authority in the last three years pursuant to the provisions on trade union referendums.

With regard to the situation of collective bargaining, the Committee notes the observations sent by the Government responding to the comments by the CTV and the ITUC regarding delays in the talks on collective agreements in the public sector and the absence of social dialogue. The Committee further notes that according to the ITUC's comments of 2010: (1) the Government's failure to engage in social dialogue and the refusal to establish tripartite consultations on policies affecting workers' conditions and living standards led to numerous trade union protests; (2) in 2009, unjustified delays in collective bargaining talks were common practice in both the public and the private sectors; and (3) the delays resulted in the expiry of many collective agreements and the failure to renew them (by June 2009, 243 collective agreements were left unsigned in the public sector, adversely affecting 1.5 million public employees, and more than 3,500 agreements had not been discussed). The Committee notes that according to the ASI, in 2008, 562 collective agreements were approved, a drop as compared to the figure for 2007 (612). The ASI adds that, according to the press, as at November 2009 only 87,821 persons were covered by collective agreements. The Committee welcomes the information provided by the Government that a number of collective agreements have been concluded (including agreements with the education, underground transportation, electricity, telecommunications, health and petroleum sectors, and with public enterprises) and that there are two collective agreements being drafted for the court workers in the judicial sector. The Committee notes the Government's statement that between 1999 and 2009, 6,914 collective agreement were approved in the country, with an aggregate total of 6,399,909 workers covered (an average of 629 collective agreements signed per year and 581,810 workers covered); 692 agreements were concluded in 2008 (with 163,528 workers covered) and 484 in 2009 (with 603,920 workers covered). According to the Government, until June 2010, three collective agreements were approved in the public sector covering 42,014 workers; during the same period, in the private sector, four collective agreements were approved covering 803,276 workers, including, as regards the latter, the Industrial Building Rule which covers 800,000 workers in the building sector. The Government adds that far from suffering any delay, standstill or obstruction, collective bargaining has been encouraged and such processes have greatly increased. In view of the considerable discrepancy in the figures supplied by the trade unions and those sent by the Government, the Committee requests the Government to continue to send information and statistics on collective agreements (number, categories covered, number of workers covered, etc.). In the Committee's view, it would be appropriate for the Government to examine, together with the trade unions, the information the number and coverage of existing collective agreements.

Lastly, the Committee notes the ITUC's statement that on 8 May 2009 the Government called a meeting to which it invited only the union organizations that support the Government's policy – the Fuerza Unitaria National Union of the Teaching Profession (SINAFUM), the Venezuelan Federation of Teachers (FVM), and the Venezuelan Federation of Educators (FEV) – and signed a collective agreement with them, leaving aside six other federations (FETRAENZÑANZA, FETRAMAGISTERIO, FETRASINED, FENAPRODO, FESLEV and FENATEV) on the grounds that they had not met the requirements for holding trade union elections and presenting financial reports to the National Electoral Council (CNE). The Committee notes with concern that in addition, according to the CTV, several large organizations – such as the Single National Union of Public Employees, and Professional, Technical and Administrative Staff of the Ministry of Health and Social Development (SUNEP-SAS), the Federation of Health Workers (FETRASALUD), the Federation of Public Employees (FEDEUNEP) and the Venezuelan Medical Federation (FMV) – have been unable to bargain collectively for the renewal of their collective agreements because of “overdue elections” (they failed to hold elections upon expiry of their executive boards' terms of office), a situation which bars them by law from exercising the right to bargaining collectively. Pointing out that certain instances of overdue elections have been linked to interference by the CNE, according to the reports issued by the Committee on Freedom of Association in recent years, the Committee requests the Government to ensure that these organizations are able to elect their bodies without any interference whatsoever from the CNE (which is not a judicial body and which may hear any claim from a small group of workers and hold up the endorsement of the elections), so that these major trade union organizations may exercise their right to bargain collectively and defend the interests of their members.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in its communication dated 24 August 2010 referring mostly to issues already raised by the Committee as well as violations of trade union rights of foreign workers and the cancellation of the registration of a trade union in the transport sector. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

Article 2 of the Convention. The Law on Trade Unions (2002). In its previous comments, the Committee had indicated that the reference to the General Federation of Trade Unions of Yemen (GFTUY) made in sections 2 (definition of “General Federation”), 20 and 21, indicating that “All the general trade unions establish a General Federation entitled the General Federation of Trade Unions of Yemen” could result in making it impossible to establish a second federation to represent workers’ interests. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that: (i) it has never imposed any prohibition on trade-union activities; (ii) the law does not stipulate that affiliation to GFTUY is obligatory and there are many other general trade unions which are not in this federation, such as the Trade Union of Doctors, Trade Union of Pharmacists, Education Professions’ Trade Unions, Journalists’ Trade Union and Lawyers’ Trade Union; (iii) there is no monopoly in representation since, in the framework of social dialogue, the interlocutor is the most representative trade union; and (iv) at the moment, the GFTUY is the most representative association of workers. While noting that the Government does not refer to the possibility of the general trade unions to form a federation different than the GFTUY, the Committee recalls that unification of the trade union movement imposed through state intervention by legislative means runs counter to the principle embodied in Articles 2 and 11 of the Convention. In these circumstances, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the Law on Trade Union so as to repeal specific reference to the GFTUY, allowing workers and their organizations to establish and join the federation of their own choosing and to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this regard in its next report.

Furthermore, the Committee had noted the exclusion from the scope of the Law of employees of high-level public authorities and Cabinets of Ministers (section 4). The Committee had recalled that senior public officials should be entitled to establish their own organizations and that the legislation should limit this category to persons exercising senior managerial or policy-making responsibilities (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 57), and had requested the Government to indicate whether the categories of workers referred to in section 4 of the Law enjoy the right to establish and join trade unions. In the absence of the Government’s reply thereon, the Committee must once again reiterate the abovementioned request.

Article 3. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that section 40(b) provides that a trade union organization can organize a strike in coordination with a trade union organization of the highest level. The Committee had recalled that a legislative provision which requires that a decision by the first-level trade union to call a strike at the local level should be approved by a higher level trade union body, is not in conformity with the right of trade unions to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. The Committee had requested the Government to clarify whether, section 40(b) requires an authorization from the higher level trade union for a strike to be organized and if that is the case, to take the necessary measures in order to amend the legislation so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention. In the absence of the Government’s reply thereon, the Committee must once again reiterate the abovementioned request.

The draft Labour Code. The Committee recalls that in its previous observations it had noted that a draft Labour Code was under discussion and that several of its provisions were not in conformity with the Convention. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that with the active participation of the ILO, it is working on the enactment of the new Labour Code and that the draft Code has been referred to the Ministry of Legal Affairs, and will consequently be referred by the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour to the Council of Ministers and afterwards to Parliament.

In this respect, the Committee must once again recall its comments concerning the draft Labour Code which read as follows:

Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee recalled that in its previous observation, it had requested the Government to ensure that domestic workers, the magistracy and the diplomatic corporations, excluded from the draft Labour Code (section 3B(2) and (4)), may fully benefit from the rights set out in the Convention and to transmit the texts of any legislation or regulations ensuring their right to organize. The Committee had further requested the Government to consider revising section 173(2) of the draft Code so to ensure that minors between the ages of 16 and 18 may join trade unions without parental authorization and noted with interest the Government’s intention to do so. The Committee had noted that the Government, in its previous report, indicated that the Committee’s observations with regard to sections 3B and 173(2) of the draft Code have been taken into consideration. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any developments in this respect.

In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the Government's indication that foreign persons holding diplomatic passports and those working in Yemen on the basis of political visas were excluded from the scope of the draft Code under section 3B(6) and that this category of workers was covered by the specific legislation, regulations and agreements on reciprocal treatment. The Committee had therefore requested the Government to indicate whether this category of foreign workers could in practice establish and join organizations of their own choosing. In the light that no new information was provided by the Government, the Committee reiterates its previous request.

Article 3. With regard to the Committee's previous request to provide a list of essential services referred to in section 219(3) of the draft Code, which empowers the Minister to submit disputes to compulsory arbitration, the Committee had noted the Government's indication that the Council of Ministers will issue such a list once the Labour Code is promulgated. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any developments in this respect.

Concerning section 211 of the draft Labour Code, which provides that strike notice must include an indication as to the duration of a strike, the Committee had noted that the Government reiterates that it is willing to take into account the previous observation of the Committee to the effect that such a requirement unduly restricts the effectiveness of an essential means for furthering and defending workers' occupational interests. It requests the Government to indicate any progress made in this regard.

Articles 5 and 6. The Committee had previously noted that section 172 of the draft Labour Code would appear to prohibit the right of workers' organizations to affiliate with international workers' organizations and that the Government had concurred that this section contradicted section 66 of the Law on Trade Unions, which ensures the right to affiliate with international organizations and the current practice. The Committee therefore expressed the hope that the Government would take the necessary measures to withdraw section 172 from the draft Labour Code. The Committee had noted the Government's indication referring to the Law on Trade Unions which allows workers' organizations to affiliate with the Arab, regional and international trade union federations and to contribute to their establishment. According to the Government, this Law leaves no room for any other text that might contradict its provisions. The Committee therefore once again expresses the firm hope that section 172 will be withdrawn from the draft Labour Code and requests the Government to keep it informed in this respect.

The Committee trusts that the present legislative reform will bring the national legislation into full conformity with the Convention, in accordance with the comments abovementioned, and once again requests the Government to indicate any development in this regard in its next report.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1969)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received.

Comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC). The Committee notes the comments submitted by the ITUC in its communication dated 24 August 2010. The Committee requests the Government to communicate its observations thereon.

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union practices. The Committee recalls that for a number of years it had been requesting the Government to ensure that effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions that guarantee the protection of workers' organizations against acts of interference by employers or their organizations in trade union activities are expressly provided for in the national legislation. In its last observation, the Committee had noted the Government's indication that: (i) the process of formulating the new draft legislative amendments to the Labour Code was under way and that it would endeavour to add provisions on penal responsibility of employers committing acts of anti-union discrimination and interference in trade union affairs in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention; and (ii) the Committee's observation would be taken into account when making amendments to the Law on Trade Unions and supplementing the Penal Code. However, no information regarding the amendments to the Law on Trade Unions or Penal Code was provided in the Government's report. Therefore, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the progress made in this respect and to provide a copy of the amended legislative texts as soon as they have been adopted.

Article 4. Power granted to the Ministry of Labour to refuse registration of a collective agreement on the basis of consideration of "economic interests of the country". The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend sections 32(6) and 34(2) of the Labour Code so as to ensure that refusal to register a collective agreement is only possible due to a procedural flaw or because it does not conform to the minimum standards laid down by the labour legislation and not on the basis of consideration of "the economic interests of the country". The Committee had previously noted: (i) that the Government reiterates that it has adopted the Committee's proposal with regard to the amendment of the abovementioned section of the Labour Code; and (ii) that the Labour Code was being revised by the Ministry of Legal Affairs before being submitted to the Council of Ministers and to the Parliament. The Committee notes that the Government once again reiterates that the Labour Code is currently being revised by the Ministry of Legal Affairs before being submitted to the Council of Ministers and to the Parliament. The Committee trusts that the legislative amendments requested in its previous observations will be fully reflected in the new legislation and once again requests the Government to provide a copy of the draft Labour Code as soon as the final version of it is available.

Collective bargaining in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to provide statistics on the number of workers covered by collective agreements in comparison with the total number of workers in the country and it had noted the Government's indication that the requested statistics on collective bargaining were available and would be sent in its subsequent reports. While noting that according to the Government, trade unions exist in the public sector and that in the private sector, trade unions have been recently established in certain institutions, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will provide the statistics requested together with its next report or at least the information available.

Finally, the Committee notes that the Government denies the ITUC's assertion according to which the Ministry of Labour revokes collective agreements and that according to the Government, there is not the slightest evidence given for it.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1996)

The Committee recalls that, for many years, it has been requesting the Government to take the necessary measures to amend several provisions of the Industrial and Labour Relations Act (ILRA) to bring it into conformity with the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that a labour law review was on the agenda of the tripartite Consultative Labour Council. The Committee notes that the Industrial and Labour Relations (Amendment) Act No. 8 of 2008 has been adopted. The Committee, however, notes that most of the proposed amendments still remain unattended to and were not taken into account during the process of the labour law review. The Committee further notes that, according to the Government's report, the concerns expressed by trade unions and employers' associations, some of which were presented before the Parliamentary Committee on Economic, Social and Labour Affairs, have been referred to the Government for consideration. Finally, the Committee notes the Government's indication that its previous comments will be taken into account in the future review of the Industrial and Labour Relations Act.

In these circumstances, the Committee must once again recall its comments and in particular that measures should be taken to bring the following provisions of the Industrial and Labour Relations Act (as amended by the Industrial and Labour Relations (Amendment) Act, 2008) (ILRA), into conformity with the Convention:

Article 2 of the Convention

- Section 2(e), which excludes from the scope of the Act, and therefore from the guarantees afforded by the Convention, workers in the prison service, judges, registrars of the court, magistrates and local court justices, and section 2(2), which accords the Minister discretionary power to exclude certain categories of workers from the scope of the Act.
- Section 5(b) that provides that an employee can only become a member of “a trade union within the sector, trade, undertaking, establishment or industry in which the employee is engaged” since it limits trade union membership to workers in the same occupation or branch of activity. In this respect, the Committee recalls that such conditions may be applied to first-level organizations, on condition that these organizations are free to establish inter-professional organizations, and to join federations and confederations in the form and manner deemed most appropriate by the workers concerned.
- Section 9(3) in order to shorten the period of registration of a trade union which is currently at a maximum of six months, constituting a serious obstacle to the establishment of organizations and amounts to denial of the right of workers to establish organizations without previous authorizations.

Article 3 of the Convention

- Section 7(3) that allows a labour commissioner to prohibit a trade union officer from holding office in any trade union for a period of one year if, following the commissioner's refusal to register the union, this union is not dissolved within six months. In this respect, the Committee recalls that having committed an act, the nature of which is not such as to call into question the integrity of the person concerned and is not such as to be prejudicial to the performance of trade union duties, should not constitute grounds for disqualification from trade union office.
- Section 21(5)(6) which confers to the Commissioner the power to suspend and appoint an interim executive board of a trade union, as well as to dissolve the board and call for a fresh election. In this respect, the Committee recalls that any removal or suspension of trade union officers, which is not the result of an internal decision of the trade union, a vote by members or normal judicial proceedings, seriously interferes in the exercise of the trade union office to which the officers have been freely elected by the members of their trade unions. Provisions which permit the suspension and removal of trade union officers by the administrative authorities or under the provisions of legislation are incompatible with the Convention. Measures of this kind should be solely directed towards protecting the members of organizations and should only be possible through judicial proceedings. The law should lay down sufficiently precise criteria to enable the judicial authority to determine whether a trade union officer has committed acts warranting his suspension or removal; provisions, which are too vague or fail to comply with the principles of the Convention, do not constitute an adequate guarantee. The persons concerned should also enjoy all the guarantees of normal judicial procedures (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraphs 122 and 123).

- Sections 18(1)(b) and 43(1)(a), under which a person, having been an officer of an employers' or workers' organization whose certificate of registration has been cancelled, may be disqualified from being an officer of a trade union if that person fails to satisfy the commissioner that she or he did not contribute to the circumstances leading to such cancellation.
- Section 78(4), which limits the maximum duration of a strike to 14 days, after which, if the dispute remains unsolved, is referred to the court. The Committee considers that such a restriction would seriously limit the means available to trade unions to further and defend the interests of their members, as well as their right to organize their activities and formulate their programmes and is not compatible with Article 3 of the Convention.
- Section 78(6)–(8), under which a strike can be discontinued if it is found by the court not to be “in the public interest”.
- Section 78(1), under which, as interpreted by a decision of the Industrial Relations Court, either party may take an industrial dispute to court.
- Section 107, which prohibits strikes in essential services, defined too broadly, and empowers the Minister to add other services to the list of essential services, in consultation with the Tripartite Consultative Labour Council.
- Section 107, which empowers a police officer to arrest, without any possibility of bail, a person who is believed to be striking in an essential service and which imposes a fine and up to six months' imprisonment. The Committee recalls that no penal sanction should be imposed against a worker for having carried out a peaceful strike and therefore measures of imprisonment should not be imposed on any account. Such sanctions could be envisaged only where during a strike, violence against persons or property or other serious infringements of rights have been committed, and can be imposed pursuant to legislation punishing such acts. Nevertheless, even in the absence of violence, if the strike modalities had the effect of making the strike illegitimate, proportionate disciplinary sanctions may be imposed against strikers.

The Committee hopes that the future amendments will take into account the comments that it has been making for many years and that they will be adopted in the very near future following full and frank consultations with the social partners. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any progress achieved in this respect and hopes that the amendments to the Act will be in full conformity with the provisions of the Convention.

ITUC comments. Finally, the Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in communications dated 24 August 2010 and 29 August 2008, on the application of the Convention and in particular concerning the intimidation of strikers through police intervention. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observation thereon.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1996)

Articles 1–4 of the Convention. The Committee had previously noted that a labour law review was on the agenda of the tripartite Consultative Labour Council. The Committee notes that the Industrial and Labour Relations (Amendment) Act No. 8 of 2008 has been adopted. The Committee however notes that according to the Government's report, most of the amendments it has previously proposed, still remain unattended to, and were not taken into account during the process of the labour law review. The Committee further notes that according to the Government's report, the concerns expressed by trade unions and employers' associations, some of which were presented before the Parliamentary Committee on Economic, Social and Labour Affairs, have been referred to the Government for consideration, although since 1997, the said provisions have not been used against workers or employers. Finally, the Committee notes the Government's indication that its previous comments have been noted and will be taken into account in the future review of the Industrial and Labour Relations Act.

In these circumstances, the Committee must recall its comments concerning the Industrial and Labour Relations Act (as amended by the Industrial and Labour Relations (Amendment) Act, 2008) (ILRA), which read as follow:

- Section 78(1)(a) and (c) and (4) of the ILRA, as amended, allows, in certain cases, either party to refer the dispute to a court or arbitration. The Committee recalls that arbitration imposed by the legislation, or at the request of one party in the services which are neither essential in the strict sense of term, nor involving civil servants exercising authority in the name of the State, is contrary to the principle of the voluntary negotiation of collective agreements. The Committee therefore requests the Government to give consideration to redrafting the above provisions so as to ensure that arbitration in services other than those mentioned above, can take place only at the request of both parties involved in the dispute.

- Section 85(3) of the ILRA, as amended, provides that the Court shall dispose of the matter before it (including disputes between an employer and an employee, as well as the matters affecting trade unions and collective bargaining rights) within a period of one year from the day on which the complaint or application is presented to it. The Committee understands that, under section 85, the Court has jurisdiction over the complaints of anti-union discrimination and trade union interference and recalls that when allegations of violation of trade union rights are concerned, both the administrative bodies and the competent judges should be empowered to give a ruling rapidly. The Committee therefore requests the Government to shorten the maximum period within which a court should consider the matter and issue its ruling thereon.

The Committee once again emphasizes the importance that should be attached to full and frank consultation taking place on any questions or proposed legislation affecting trade union rights. The Committee hopes that the envisaged amendments will be adopted in the very near future following full and frank consultations with the social partners. It requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any progress achieved in this respect and once again hopes that the amendments to the Act will be in full conformity with the provisions of the Convention and its comments above.

International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) comments. The Committee notes the comments made by ITUC in communications dated 29 August 2008 and 24 August 2010, stating that trade union rights are widely flouted, particularly in the mining sector, which is dominated by foreign owners who are often accused of intimidating behaviour. ITUC further indicates that the increasing number of sub-contractors in the mining industry makes it harder to organize, and when trade unions do succeed, they are faced with obstacles to bargain collectively. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2003)

Follow-up to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry (complaint made under article 26 of the Constitution of the ILO)

The Committee recalls that a Commission of Inquiry was established at the 303rd Session of the Governing Body (November 2008) to examine a complaint presented under article 26 of the ILO Constitution alleging the failure of the Government to observe Convention No. 87 and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). The Committee observes that the Commission of Inquiry completed its work in December 2009 and that its report was submitted to the Governing Body at its 307th Session (March 2010).

The Committee takes note of the reply of the Government to the report of the Commission of Inquiry by virtue of article 29 of the ILO Constitution, which was noted by the Governing Body at its 308th Session (GB.308/6/2). The Government has indicated that the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry will be implemented in the context of its current legislative and institutional reform programme and welcomed the guidance and support of the ILO in their implementation.

The Committee recalls that in commenting on the observance of the Convention by the Government, it has been raising many of the same points examined by the Commission of Inquiry. It notes that the Commission has confirmed and expanded upon the concerns that this Committee, as well as the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, have been raising as to the application of this fundamental Convention.

The Committee notes, in particular, that the Commission recommended that: the relevant legislative texts be brought in line with Conventions Nos 87 and 98; all anti-union practices – arrests, detentions, violence, torture, intimidation and harassment, interference and anti-union discrimination – cease with immediate effect; national institutions continue the process the Commission had started whereby people can be heard, in particular referring to the Human Rights Commission and the Organ for National Healing and Reconciliation; training on freedom of association and collective bargaining, civil liberties and human rights be given to key personnel in the country; the rule of law and the role of the courts reinforced; social dialogue strengthened in recognition of its importance in the maintenance of democracy; and ILO technical assistance to the country continued.

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ITUC) and the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions (ZCTU) on the application of the Convention in their communications dated 24 August 2010 and 27 September 2010, respectively. The Committee notes that the allegations submitted by the ZCTU relate to the forced exile of the General Secretary of the General Agriculture and Plantation Workers Union of Zimbabwe (GAPWUZ) and instances of banning of trade union activities (workshop, commemoration events, processions and May Day celebration). The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on those serious allegations.

The Committee notes with interest the launch, on 27 August 2010, of the ILO technical assistance package, which aims to support the Government and the social partners in implementing the recommendations so as to ensure full freedom of association in the country. The Committee further notes with interest the strong commitment expressed on that occasion by all stakeholders to implement the recommendations. The Committee further notes that in order to give practical effect to this commitment, the tripartite constituents identified seven priority activities to be carried out in the period from September to December 2010 aimed, among others, at: finalizing a set of principles for the harmonization of labour laws and the amendment of the Labour Act; identifying and attempting to resolve outstanding cases of trade unionists arrested under the Public Order and Security Act (POSA); capacity building for provincial police, security forces, prosecutors and magistrates in relation to trade union rights; capacity building for judiciary, labour officers, conciliators and arbitrators in relation to trade union rights; and strengthening interface between social partners and national human rights institutions. Further activities to be carried out in 2011 are in the process of being developed in consultation with the social partners.

The Committee notes that the following activities have taken place already: (i) a seminar for government officials on international labour standards, human rights and social dialogue in the world of work; (ii) the launch of the Kadoma Declaration “Towards a shared economic and social vision” concluded by the Government and the social partners under the auspices of the Tripartite Negotiating Forum (TNF) in 2009; and (iii) an activity on the finalization of the principles of harmonization of labour laws and the amendment of the Labour Act.

The Committee notes the Government’s report on the outcome of the latter activity. The Government explains that the objective of this activity was to facilitate the amendment of the relevant legislation, and thereby give effect to the legislative recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. The set of principles was to be finalized and adopted at a workshop involving the key actors: members of the Tripartite Advisory Council, the principals of labour and business, the Public Service Commission, the Health Service Board, and with the participation of the ministers of labour and public service. The Government regrets that due to the absence at the meeting of ZCTU representatives, the desired outcome was not achieved. Nevertheless, the meeting allowed discussion of some urgent issues and consolidation of the principles which will now be reconsidered by the Tripartite Advisory Council.

The Committee understands that outstanding cases of trade unionists arrested under POSA have been identified. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the steps taken to ensure that these cases are withdrawn.

The Committee further requests the Government to provide in its next report detailed information on the outcome of the activities carried out under the technical assistance package and on all other measures taken to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry.

Taking due note of the initiated labour law reform and harmonization process, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the relevant legislative texts will be brought in line with the Convention and recalls that the ILO supervisory bodies stressed the need to amend, in particular, the Labour Act and the Public Service Act, so as to ensure compliance with the following Articles of the Convention.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations without previous authorization

- the need to ensure the right to establish and join trade unions of members of the public service and prison staff; and
- the need to ensure the right to organize of managers (currently, under section 2 of the Labour Act, managers are considered to be employers).

Article 3. Right of workers’ organizations to elect their representatives in full freedom, organize their administration, and to formulate their programmes

- the need to amend section 51 of the Labour Act, which concerns the supervision of election of officers of a trade union or employers’ organization so as to guarantee the right of employers’ and workers’ organizations to elect their representatives in full freedom and without interference from the authorities;
- the need to amend sections 28(2), 54(2) and (3) and 55 of the Labour Act which confers on the minister extensive powers to regulate trade union dues as well as to regulate such matters as staff that may be employed by trade unions, their salaries and allowances, as well as the equipment and property that may be purchased by trade unions, so as to ensure that freedom of employers’ and workers’ organizations to organize their administration and dispose of all their fixed and movable assets unhindered;
- the need to amend section 120(2) of the Labour Act, which confers on the minister the right to appoint an investigator who shall at all reasonable times and without prior notice, enter any premises (paragraph (a)); question any person employed on the premises (paragraph (b)); and inspect and make copies of and take extracts from any books, records or other documents on the premises (paragraph (c)), so as to ensure the right of the inviolability of trade union premises and to avoid any danger of excessive intervention in the internal administration of trade unions; and
- the need to effectively guarantee the right to strike through, among other measures: (i) simplifying the procedure for declaring a strike; (ii) amending section 102 of the Labour Act providing for the right of the minister to declare any service essential; (iii) ensuring that a strike can be restricted or banned only in essential services in the strict sense of the term, that is those services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population, so as to effectively ensure workers’ right to strike; and (iv) amending sections 107, 109 and 112 of the Labour Act providing for excessive sanctions in cases of unlawful collective action being organized.

Furthermore, referring to the conclusions of the Commission of Inquiry (paragraphs 558–562 of the report) and noting with concern the abovementioned recent ZCTU allegations, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures in order to ensure, in law and in practice, the right of trade unions to organize and carry out meetings, assemblies, demonstrations and pickets without interference by the police and security forces. In particular, it urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the POSA is not used to infringe upon legitimate trade union rights, including the right of workers' organizations to express their views on the Government's economic and social policy.

Noting the commitment of the Government to identify and attempt to resolve outstanding cases of trade unionists arrested under the POSA, the Committee urges the Government to intensify its efforts in this respect and to provide information in this regard in its next report. The Committee expresses the firm hope that it will be in the position to note that no charges are pending against trade unionists under the POSA when it examines next the application of the Convention in Zimbabwe.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1998)

Follow-up to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry (complaint made under article 26 of the Constitution of the ILO)

The Committee takes note of the conclusions and recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry established to examine the observance by the Government of Zimbabwe of Conventions Nos 87 and 98 and the Government's reply thereon, as detailed in the comments on the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

The Committee notes with interest the launch, on 27 August 2010, of the ILO technical assistance package, which aims to support the Government and the social partners in implementing the recommendations of the Commission so as to ensure full freedom of association in the country and the ensuing activities that have taken place, as well as the envisaged measures, as detailed in the comments on the application of Convention No. 87. The Committee requests the Government to provide in its next report detailed information on the outcome of the activities carried out under the ILO technical assistance package and on all other measures taken to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee notes that, having examined numerous allegations of anti-union discrimination (dismissals, transfers and even eviction from their homes), the Commission of Inquiry concluded that there was no adequate protection against anti-union discrimination in the country. The Committee concurs with the Commission which recalled that, by virtue of its ratification of Convention, the Government is responsible for preventing all acts of anti-union discrimination and must ensure that complaints of anti-union discrimination are examined in the framework of national procedures which should be expeditious – so that the necessary remedies can be really effective – inexpensive and fully impartial, and considered as such by the parties concerned. In other words, where cases of alleged anti-union discrimination are involved, the competent authorities dealing with labour issues should begin an inquiry immediately and take suitable measures to remedy any effects of anti-union discrimination brought to their attention. In this regard, the Commission stressed that the remedy of reinstatement should be available to those who are victims of anti-union discrimination and, if reinstatement is not possible, the Government should ensure that the workers concerned are paid adequate compensation which would represent a sufficiently dissuasive sanction for anti-trade union dismissals (see paragraph 586 of the Report of the Commission of Inquiry: Truth, reconciliation and justice in Zimbabwe). The Committee requests the Government to indicate specific measures taken or envisaged to ensure that the above principle is enshrined in the national legislation, and applied and respected in practice.

Article 4. Collective bargaining. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments, it had raised concern with regard to the following legislative provisions, also raised by the Commission of Inquiry in its report:

- section 17 of the Labour Act, which empower the Minister to issue regulations on an extensive list of matters, including conditions of employment;
- sections 78 and 79, which empower the Minister to direct the Registrar not to register an agreement “if any provision appears to the Minister to be inconsistent with legislation or unreasonable or unfair”;
- sections 25 and 81, pursuant to which, the Minister can “direct the parties to negotiate an amendment” to a registered collective agreement if it contains a provision “that is, or that has become, inconsistent with legislation in force or is unreasonable or unfair”. The Minister may then amend the agreement in accordance with the proposed amendment, or “in such other manner that is consistent with the considerations of legislative consistency, reasonableness and fairness”; and
- section 93(3-5), which provides that disputes of interest in the essential services that have not been settled within 30 days or such other period as agreed by the parties will be referred to compulsory arbitration.

Article 6. Collective bargaining in the public service. Noting that currently, public servants have no collective bargaining rights, the Committee, like the Commission of Inquiry, stresses that all workers, including public servants, should be entitled to bargain collectively to determine their conditions of work. Only public servants, who, by their functions, are directly engaged in the administration of the State (that is, civil servants employed in government ministries and other comparable bodies), as well as officials acting as supporting elements in these activities can be excluded from the protection of Convention.

Taking due note of the initiated labour law reform and harmonization process, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the relevant legislative texts, and in particular, the Labour Act and the Public Service Act, will be brought in line with the Convention, taking into account the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and the Committee's comments above. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information in its next report on all measures taken or envisaged in this respect, as well as to transmit texts of any relevant draft or adopted legislation, so that it may examine its conformity with the provisions of the Convention.

In addition, requests regarding certain points are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 11 (Kyrgyzstan, Uganda); Convention No. 87 (Armenia, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Cambodia, Cape Verde, Congo, Croatia, Czech Republic, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Djibouti, Egypt, Eritrea, Kuwait, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia, Lesotho, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Malawi, Mali, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mongolia, Montenegro, Namibia, Netherlands: Aruba, Netherlands: Netherlands Antilles, Nicaragua, Norway, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Philippines, Portugal, Romania, Russian Federation, Rwanda, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Serbia, Sierra Leone, Suriname, Swaziland, Switzerland, Tajikistan, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Togo, Turkmenistan, Uganda, United Kingdom, United Kingdom: Anguilla, Uruguay); Convention No. 98 (Barbados, Cambodia, Congo, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Kuwait, Kyrgyzstan, Lebanon, Lithuania, Mauritania, Montenegro, Morocco, Mozambique, Namibia, Niger, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Senegal, Singapore, Slovakia, South Africa, Suriname, Tajikistan, Togo, Tunisia, United Kingdom: Anguilla); Convention No. 135 (Burundi, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Sao Tome and Principe, Sri Lanka); Convention No. 151 (Sao Tome and Principe, Seychelles, Turkey); Convention No. 154 (Kyrgyzstan, Sao Tome and Principe, Slovenia, Uganda, Uzbekistan).

Forced labour

Afghanistan

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1963)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. For a number of years, the Committee has been referring to the following provisions of the Penal Code, under which prison sentences involving an obligation to perform labour may be imposed:

- sections 184(3), 197(1)(a) and 240 concerning, among others, the publication and propagation of news, information, false or self-interested statements, biased or inciting propaganda concerning internal affairs of the country which reduces the prestige and standing of the State, or for the purpose of harming public interest and goods; and
- section 221(1), (4) and (5) concerning a person who creates, establishes, organizes or administers an organization in the name of a party, society, union or group with the aim of disturbing and nullifying one of the basic and accepted national values in the political, social, economic or cultural spheres of the State, or engages in propaganda to promote or attract members to such organization, by whatever means, or who joins such an organization or develops contacts personally or through a third party with such an organization or one of its branches.

The Committee pointed out, referring to paragraphs 154 and 163 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, that the Convention does not prohibit punishment by penalties involving compulsory labour of persons who use violence, incite to violence or engage in preparatory acts aimed at violence. Sanctions, however, involving compulsory labour fall within the scope of the Convention when they enforce a prohibition of the peaceful expression of views or of opposition to the established political, social or economic system. A similar situation arises when certain political views are prohibited, subject to penalties involving compulsory labour, as a consequence of the prohibition of political parties or associations.

The Committee reiterates its hopes that these penal provisions will be re-examined in the light of the Convention with a view to ensuring that no sanctions involving forced or compulsory labour may be imposed as a punishment for holding or expressing political or ideological views and that the Government will indicate, in its next report, the measures taken or envisaged to this end.

Algeria

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 2(1) of the Convention. Civic service. Since 1986, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the incompatibility with the Convention of sections 32, 33, 34 and 38 of Act No. 84-10 of 11 February 1984 on civic service, as amended and supplemented by Act No. 86-11 of 19 August 1986 and by Act No. 06-15 of 14 November 2006, under which it is possible to require persons who have completed a course of higher education or training to perform a period of civic service ranging from one to four years before being able to exercise an occupation or obtain employment.

The Government indicated that civic service is a statutory period of work performed for a public administration, body or enterprise in local communities by persons to whom such an obligation applies. It represents a contribution of such persons to the economic, social and cultural development of the country. According to the Government, persons liable to perform civic service have the same rights and obligations as the workers governed by the legislation respecting the general conditions of service of workers, including the right to receive remuneration from the employing entity in accordance with the law. Furthermore, the years of civic service performed are taken into account for purposes of seniority, promotion and retirement, and also in the contract period during which the person concerned is bound to a public body by a training contract. The Government further indicated that persons obliged to perform civic service are assigned exclusively to the specialized branch or discipline in which they were trained.

The Committee noted these explanations. However, it also pointed out that, under sections 32 and 38 of the Act, any refusal to perform civic service and the resignation of the person concerned without valid reason results in the prohibition on their exercising an activity on their own account, and that any infringement will incur the penalties laid down in section 243 of the Penal Code (imprisonment ranging from three months to two years and/or a fine of between 500 and 5,000 DA). Similarly, under sections 33 and 34 of the Act, all private employers are required to satisfy themselves before engaging any workers that applicants are not subject to civic service or can produce documentation proving that they have completed it. Furthermore, any private employer knowingly employing a citizen who has evaded civic service is liable to imprisonment and a fine. Hence, even though persons liable to civic service benefit from conditions of work (remuneration, seniority, promotion, retirement, etc.) similar to those of regular public sector workers, they discharge this service under threat because, in the event of any refusal, they are denied access to any self-employed occupational activity or employment in the private sector. This means that civic service falls within the concept of compulsory labour within the meaning of Article 2(1) of the Convention. Furthermore, since it consists of a contribution by the persons concerned to the economic development of the country, this compulsory service violates Article 1(b) of Convention No. 105, which has also been ratified by Algeria.

In its report of 2008, the Government explains that civic service currently in force in Algeria may be regarded as an opportunity, given in particular to persons who have completed higher education, to familiarize themselves with the world of work and facilitate their integration into working life. While noting the willingness expressed by the Government in its report to take account of the Committee's comments, until the removal of the ambiguities resulting from the application of the law has been achieved, the Committee reiterates the hope that the Government will take the necessary steps to repeal or amend the provisions concerned in the light of Conventions Nos 29 and 105 and that the Government will soon be in a position to report on the measures adopted in this respect.

The Committee further noted that under section 2 of Ordinance No. 06-06 of 15 July 2006, civic service may be performed in private-sector health establishments in accordance with arrangements set forth by regulation. The Committee reminds the Government that, according to Paragraph 3(3) of the Special Youth Schemes Recommendation, 1970 (No. 136), the services of participants should not be used for the advantage of private persons or undertakings. Since the Government has not supplied any information on this point, the Committee reaffirms the hope that the Government will take this into account and again requests it to indicate whether regulations have been adopted to specify arrangements under which civic service may be performed in private-sector health establishments and, if so, to provide a copy. It also again requests the Government to indicate whether, in practice, persons subject to the civic service obligation perform such service in private-sector health establishments, and to supply any other information allowing the extent of this practice to be assessed (number of persons and establishments concerned, length of service, etc.), together with information on the conditions of work of the persons concerned.

Article 2(2)(a). National service. The Committee has been referring for a number of years to Ordinance No. 74-103 of 15 November 1974 issuing the National Service Code and the Order of 1 July 1987, under which conscripts are required to take part in the running of various sectors of the economy and administration. The Committee noted that they are further required to perform civic service for a period ranging from one to four years, as referred to above. The Committee recalled that, under the terms of Article 2(2)(a), of the Convention, compulsory military service is excluded from the scope of the Convention only where conscripts are assigned to work of a purely military character.

The Government indicated in a previous report that the civic form of national service had not been used since 2001. The Government explained that this de facto suspension would be reflected in law as soon as the reform of the National Service Code was placed on the agenda. As the Government has not provided any information on this point, the Committee again requests it to provide information on any developments in this matter showing that the national legislation has been aligned with practice and hence with the provisions of the Convention, and to provide copies of the relevant texts.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1969)

The Committee notes that the Government's report contains no reply to its previous comments. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

In the communication received in November 2009, the Government indicates that, according to the national legislation, prison labour is a voluntary activity based on the prisoners' consent and performed in accordance with the prisoners' state of health and their physical and psychological abilities. According to the Government, a personal file shall be constituted in regard to each prisoner called on to perform prison work, which necessarily contains a medical certificate and a document confirming the prisoner's explicit acceptance to work. The Committee takes note of this information, but observes, however, that voluntary character of prison labour does not follow from the legislation, which stipulates that "prisoners shall be given useful work" (section 2 of Inter-Ministerial Order of 26 June 1983 on the modalities of the use of a prison workforce by the National Office of Educational Works) and that "a prisoner may be assigned useful work by the director of the penitentiary establishment" (section 96 of Act No. 05-04 of 6 February 2005 establishing the Code on Penal Institutions and Social Integration of Inmates).

The Committee asks the Government to supply sample copies of personal files of prisoners called on to perform prison work, and in particular, copies of documents confirming the prisoner's explicit acceptance to work. The Committee also considers that, if in practice prison labour is voluntary, it would be appropriate to amend legislation accordingly, in order to avoid any legal ambiguity. It hopes that the Government will supply, in its next report, information on the progress made in this regard. The Committee also repeats its previous comments, to which the Government has not replied in its report.

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Penalties for expressing political views. For many years the Committee has referred to Act No. 90-31 of 4 December 1990 concerning associations, certain provisions of which allow the imposition of prison sentences involving the obligation to work in circumstances which are covered by the Convention. The Committee previously noted that, under section 5 of the Act, an association's legal status is automatically invalidated if its objectives are contrary to the established institutional system or public order or offend morals or the laws and regulations in force. It further noted that, under section 45 of the Act, anyone who manages, administers or actively participates in an association that has not been approved or which has been suspended or dissolved, or facilitates meetings of the members of such an association, shall be liable to imprisonment ranging from three months to two years involving the obligation to work.

The Committee noted the information sent by the Government to the effect that the penalty laid down by section 45 of Act No. 90-31 of 4 December 1990 concerns persons breaching the legal provisions regarding the establishment of associations and not persons holding certain political views, which could be expressed in full freedom subject to the legislation in force. In its General Survey of 2007 on the eradication of forced labour, the Committee indicated that the range of activities which must be protected, under the present provisions of the Convention, from punishment involving forced or compulsory labour, includes the freedom to express political or ideological views, and also various other generally recognized rights. The latter include the rights of association and of assembly, through which citizens seek to secure the dissemination and acceptance of their views and the adoption of policies and laws reflecting them, and which may also be affected by measures of political coercion (see paragraph 152 of the General Survey). The provisions imposing the penalty of imprisonment involving the obligation to work on any infringement of the rules governing the establishment, dissolution or approval of an association are therefore contrary to the Convention. The Committee therefore again requests the Government to take the necessary steps to bring its legislation into conformity with the provisions of the Convention, either by amending section 45 of Act No. 90-31 of 4 December 1990 or by explicitly exempting the persons convicted under this section from the obligation to work.

The Committee previously asked the Government to supply information on the practical application of section 87bis of the Penal Code (Ordinance No. 95-11 of 25 February 1995) on "terrorist or subversive acts", which permits imprisonment involving compulsory labour for anyone convicted of committing a number of very broadly defined acts. It noted the information sent by the Government to the effect that section 87bis of the Penal Code deals with acts affecting the security of the State, territorial integrity, national unity, stability and the normal working of institutions, through use of violence. The Government indicated that acts having a peaceful objective do not come under the scope of section 87bis.

The Committee observed, however, that the very general terms of section 87bis of the Penal Code – obstructing traffic or freedom of movement on public thoroughfares and occupying public places with gatherings, damaging means of communication and transport, public and private property, taking possession thereof or unduly occupying it, obstructing the actions of the public authorities or the free exercise of worship or public freedoms and also the functioning of public service establishments, hindering the operation of public institutions – might enable peaceful acts to be penalized. The Committee underlines the fact that, although anti-terrorist legislation responds to the legitimate need to protect the safety of the population against the use of violence, it can still become a means of political coercion and of repression of the peaceful exercise of civil rights and liberties, such as freedom of expression and freedom of association. The Convention protects these rights and liberties against repression which is exercised by means of penalties involving an obligation to work, and the limits which the law may impose on them must be strictly defined.

The Committee therefore hopes that the Government will soon take the necessary steps to limit the scope of section 87bis of the Penal Code so that persons who peacefully express ideological opposition to the established political, social or economic system cannot be sentenced to a term of imprisonment which includes the obligation to work.

Article 1(d). Penalties for participating in strikes. For a number of years the Committee has referred to section 41 of Act No. 90-02 of 6 February 1990 on the prevention and settlement of collective labour disputes and the exercise of the right to strike, which states that requisition orders may be issued pursuant to the legislation in force for workers on strike who hold posts in public institutions or administrations, or in enterprises, that are essential for the safety of persons, plant and property and for the continuity of public services which are essential to the vital needs of the country, or who carry on activities essential to supplying the public. Section 42 states that, without prejudice to the penalties laid down in the Penal Code, refusal to execute a requisition order constitutes serious professional misconduct.

The Committee previously noted that sections 37 and 38 of Act No. 90-02 establish a list of essential services in which the right to strike is limited and for which a compulsory minimum service must be organized. It observed that the list is very broad and includes services such as banking and radio/television services, which, according to the Committee on Freedom of Association, do not constitute essential services in the strict sense of the term (see Digest of decisions and principles of the Freedom of Association Committee, 2006, paragraph 587, and also the General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraphs 159–160). The list in sections 37 and 38 of Act No. 90-02 also includes court registry services.

The Committee also referred to section 43 of Act No. 90-02 prohibiting strikes in certain sectors of public institutions and administrations, such as the judiciary and customs. Furthermore, section 55(1) of Act No. 90-02 provides that anyone who causes or seeks to cause, or maintains or seeks to maintain, a concerted collective stoppage of work in conflict with the provisions of this Act, but without violence or assault against persons or property, shall be liable to imprisonment ranging from eight days to two months and/or a fine.

The Committee noted the Government's information in a previous report that the imposition of any penalty on workers taking part in a strike is prohibited. It also noted the Government's statement that the organization of a minimum service provided for by Act No. 90-02 does not constitute forced labour, the objective being to ensure the functioning of public institutions. While noting these indications, the Committee recalled that penalizing participation in strikes through imprisonment including the obligation to work is contrary to the present provisions of the Convention. It also recalled that as an exception to the general principle of the right to strike, the essential services in which this principle may be entirely or partly waived should be defined restrictively, and therefore should include only those services, the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population (see General Surveys on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 159, and on the eradication of forced labour, paragraph 185). The Committee again requests the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that no worker may be sentenced to imprisonment including the obligation to work for going on strike and also to supply information on the practical application of sections 41, 43 and 55(1) of Act No. 90-02, stating in particular the number of persons convicted and supplying copies of any court decisions issued.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1992)

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Vulnerable situation of migrant workers in the construction sector. The Committee notes the communication dated 1 September 2010 received from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), which contains comments on the application of the Convention by Azerbaijan. It also notes the Government's reply to this communication received on 29 November 2010.

The Communication by the ITUC contains allegations concerning the situation of about 700 workers from Bosnia and Herzegovina, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and Serbia who were working on construction sites managed by the SerbAz Design and Construction Company in Azerbaijan. The ITUC refers in this connection to the reports received from the Office for Democratic Institutions and Human Rights (ODIHR) of the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) and from ASTRA (Anti-Trafficking Action), an NGO in Serbia. According to the allegations, workers had been recruited in Bosnia and Herzegovina and, once in Azerbaijan, were not provided with any legal work permits, but only with tourist visas, having also to hand over their passports to their employer. Without identification documents and residence permits, workers' freedom of movement was limited and their vulnerability was aggravated by the fact that they were obliged to live at the construction site, being strictly forbidden to leave, subject to threats of penalties, including physical punishment. The ITUC further alleged that workers had been living in appalling conditions, with insufficient food, water or proper medical services, which lead to two deaths.

The ITUC expressed the view that there have been indications of forced labour in this case, which include, inter alia, the use of threats and abuse of workers' vulnerability; coercion; deception regarding working and living conditions; physical punishment, high recruitment fees; withholding of wages; salary deductions; confiscation of documents; absence of work permits; limitations to freedom of movement; and absence of regular employment contracts.

The ITUC informs that the OSCE representative visited the construction sites and confirmed the poor living conditions and apparent threats to workers. The Azeri Parliament was also informed of the situation and debated the issue, coinciding with the submission of the annual report of the Azerbaijan National Anti-Trafficking Coordinator, which stated, however, that the situation of Serbian and Bosnian workers did not fall within Azerbaijan's jurisdiction, since the workers signed work agreements with SerbAz in their countries of origin. According to the above communication by the ITUC, some investigations have been initiated by national authorities in Bosnia and Herzegovina and Azerbaijan; in December 2009, investigations concerning 14 accused were in process in Bosnia and Herzegovina, and the case had been forwarded to the Public Prosecutor's Office. A petition to the Ombudsman in Azerbaijan had also been prepared, and about 500 workers in Bosnia and Herzegovina were preparing to submit a case to the court in Azerbaijan to claim unpaid wages and other violations of workers' rights.

Finally, the ITUC informs that, in April 2010, a cooperation agreement on mutual protection of migrant workers, prepared with the assistance of the Building and Wood Workers' International (BWI), had been signed by construction workers' unions from Bosnia and Herzegovina and from Azerbaijan.

In its reply to the comments submitted by the ITUC, the Government denies the allegations, indicating that no direct appeals from workers employed by SerbAz regarding labour violations have been submitted to the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection of Population of the Republic of Azerbaijan. It further indicates that the only information concerning workers' rights violations had been received from the NGO "Azerbaijan Migration Centre", and that an appropriate investigation has been subsequently conducted by the State Labour Inspectorate, which did not confirm the allegations against the SerbAz company. According to the investigation, "it was defined that some specialists from a number of foreign countries were on their business trip" for that company. Finally, the Government informs that no individual work permits for foreign citizens have been obtained by the SerbAz company.

While noting the above information and considering the gravity of the allegations, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to thoroughly investigate the alleged facts, and will provide information on measures taken or envisaged in order to strengthen the protection of migrant workers, so as to prevent the abuses of workers' rights and to exclude the exploitation of their vulnerable situation which might lead to the exaction of labour for which the workers have not offered themselves voluntarily. The Committee also requests the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the outcome of any legal proceedings which have been instituted regarding this case.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1(c) of the Convention. Disciplinary measures applicable to seafarers. For many years, the Committee has been referring to certain provisions of the 1976 Merchant Shipping Act, under which various breaches of labour discipline are punishable with imprisonment (involving an obligation to work, under section 10 of the Prisons Act and rules 76 and 95 of the Prison Rules) and deserting seafarers from ships registered in another country may be forcibly conveyed on board the ship. The Committee has noted the Government's indications in its earlier reports that some amendments to the Merchant Shipping Act have been made. It notes, however, that under sections 129(b) and (c) and 131(a) and (b) of the updated text of the Merchant Shipping Act, which it has consulted on the Government's website, penalties of imprisonment may still be imposed for breaches of discipline such as disobedience to lawful command, neglect of duty, desertion and absence without leave, and section 135 of the Act still provides for the forcible conveyance of deserting seafarers to ships registered in another country, where it appears to the minister that reciprocal arrangements will be made in that country.

The Committee recalls that Article 1(c) expressly prohibits the use of any form of forced or compulsory labour as a means of labour discipline. As the Committee repeatedly pointed out, only acts which endanger the ship or the life or health of persons are excluded from the scope of the Convention (see, for example, paragraphs 179–181 of the General Survey of 2007 on the eradication of forced labour). The Committee therefore reiterates its hope that the necessary measures will at last be taken with a view to amending the above provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, either by repealing sanctions involving compulsory labour or by restricting their application to the situations where the ship or the life or health of persons are endangered (as is the case, e.g. in section 128 of the same Act). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard in its next report.

Article 1(d). Punishment for having participated in strikes. Over a number of years, the Committee has been referring to section 73 of the 1970 Industrial Relations Act, as amended, under which the minister may refer a dispute in non-essential services to the tribunal for settlement, if he considers that a public interest so requires; the recourse to strike action in this situation is prohibited, violation being punishable with penalties of imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour, as explained above) under sections 74(3) and 77(2)(a) of the same Act. The Committee has further noted that, according to section 76(1), a strike which, in the opinion of the minister, affects or threatens the public interest, might also be referred to the tribunal for settlement, failure to discontinue the participation in such a strike being punishable with imprisonment under section 76(2)(b).

The Committee previously noted the Government's indications in its earlier report that the proposed Trade Unions and Industrial Relations Bill had been tabled in the House of Assembly, and that it contained no provisions imposing sanctions of imprisonment for breach of the legislation, which may be punished only with fines. The Committee also noted the Government's repeated statement that the above provisions of the Industrial Relations Act had never been applied in practice, and that the legislation would be amended when a consensus is achieved after further consultation with the social partners.

While having noted these indications, the Committee reiterates the firm hope that the review of the Act announced by the Government for a number of years will soon result in the amendment of the above provisions, so that no sanctions involving compulsory labour can be imposed for the mere fact of participating in a peaceful strike, in order to bring legislation into conformity with the Convention. Referring also to its comments made in 2007 under Convention No. 87, likewise ratified by the Bahamas, the Committee asks the Government to supply a copy of the new legislation, as soon as it is adopted.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

Article 2(2)(a) of the Convention. Work of a purely military character performed in virtue of compulsory military service laws. In its previous comments the Committee drew the Government's attention to the provisions of section 35 of Act No. 63-5 of 26 June 1963 concerning recruitment, according to which the purpose of active military service is, first, to provide conscripts with military instruction and also education intended to develop their civic sense and, second, to further their training and employ them, inter alia, in specialized army units to participate in the work of national construction.

The Committee notes the concise information supplied in the Government's report to the effect that young persons receive training for working life in the context of military service and at the end of the training they are not subject to any commitment.

The Committee recalls that, under Article 2(2)(a) of the Convention, work or service exacted in virtue of compulsory military service laws is only excluded from the scope of the Convention on condition that it is of a purely military character. On the other hand, the Convention is not opposed to the performance of non-military work by career members of the armed forces on a voluntary basis (see paragraph 46 of the Committee's 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour). However, under the provisions of Act No. 63-5, the work exacted from conscripts is not limited to work of a purely military character and can therefore be considered as forced or compulsory labour within the meaning of the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government once again to take the necessary steps to bring the provisions of section 35 of Act No. 63-5 into conformity with those of the Convention.

In its previous comments the Committee noted the adoption of Act No. 2007-27 of 23 October 2007 establishing military service in the national interest, pursuant to Act No. 63-5 of 26 June 1963 concerning recruitment, on which the Committee has commented (see above), and also the adoption of Decree No. 2007-486 of 31 October 2007 establishing general conditions for the organization and performance of military service in the national interest. It noted that, under the terms of sections 2 and 5 of Act No. 2007-27, military service in the national interest consists of compulsory service for 12 months, supplements active military service and is compulsory for all Beninese nationals of both sexes aged between 18 and 35 years. The Committee noted that, under section 3 of the Act, the purpose of military service in the national interest is the mobilization of citizens with a view to their participation in work for the development of the country. Section 4 states that, after an initial phase of instruction, recruits are then assigned to administrative units, production units, institutions and bodies with a view to participating in the performance of relevant work in the national interest which is of a social or economic nature. According to section 18 of Decree No. 2007-486, after two months of military, civic and moral training, recruits are engaged in socio-economic development work for nine months. The Committee noted that the provisions of Act No. 2007-27 and Decree No. 2007-486 do not satisfy the conditions of Article 2(2)(a) of the Convention, inasmuch as those conscripted for military service in the national interest are assigned to socio-economic development work which is not of a purely military character. The Committee therefore requests the Government once again to take the necessary steps to amend or repeal Act No. 2007-27 and Decree No. 2007-486 in such a way as to ensure their conformity with the Convention.

In its previous comments the Committee observed that Act No. 83-007 of 17 May 1983 governing civic, patriotic, ideological and military service conflicts with the Convention since persons subject to this compulsory civic and military service are assigned to a production unit in accordance with their occupational skills and may be compelled to perform work which is not of a purely military character. The Committee noted the Government's statement that this Act is no longer applied in practice. It again requests the Government to indicate in its next report whether Act No. 83-007 of 17 May 1983 has actually been repealed and, if so, to provide a copy of the repealing legislation.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1961)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Imposition of prison sentences involving the obligation to work as punishment for expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. For many years the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to certain provisions of Act No. 60-12 of 30 June 1960 on the freedom of the press, under which various acts or activities relating to the exercise of freedom of expression are punishable by imprisonment, and that convicted prisoners may be assigned social rehabilitation work under the terms of section 67 of Decree No. 73-293 of 15 September 1973 issuing the prison regulations. The Committee referred more specifically to the following sections of the Act: section 8 (deposit of a publication with the authorities before its release to the public); section 12 (a ban on publications of foreign origin in French or the vernacular, printed within or outside the country); section 20 (incitement to commit an act classified as an offence); section 23 (causing offence to the Prime Minister); section 25 (publication of false reports); and sections 26 and 27 (slander and insults).

The Committee also referred to Act No. 97-010 of 20 August 1997 liberalizing audiovisual communication and establishing special penal provisions for offences relating to the press and audiovisual communications. While noting that the provisions of Act No. 97-010 prevail should they conflict with those of the Act on the freedom of the press, the Committee pointed out that the two Acts are different in scope, since Act No. 97-010 covers audiovisual communications and the Act on the freedom of the press covers printing, books and periodicals. This being the case, the Committee also drew the Government's attention to certain provisions of Act No. 97-010: section 79(3), under which "any seditious shouting or chanting against the lawfully established authorities in public places or meetings" is punishable by imprisonment of six months to two years; section 81, under which causing offence to the President of the Republic is punishable by imprisonment of one to five years; and section 80, which establishes the penalty of imprisonment of two to five years for any provocation against the public security forces aimed at distracting them from their duty of defending security or of obeying the orders given by their chiefs for the enforcement of military laws and regulations.

The Government indicates in its report that the four laws governing the press (Act No. 60-12 of 30 June 1962 on the freedom of the press; Act No. 97-010 of 20 August 1997 liberalizing audiovisual communications; Act No. 84-007 of 15 March 1984 on advertising posters; and Ordinance No. 69-22/PR/MJL of 4 July 1969 establishing penalties for certain acts likely to cause a breach of the peace and for the publication, dissemination and reproduction of false reports) have become outdated in relation to the requirements of this sector and must be amended to be brought into line with international conventions. The Government also indicates that these legislative texts have been grouped together in one law, the draft of which will soon be referred to Parliament for adoption, and also that the Committee's comments have been taken into account in this bill, so that the exercise of freedom of expression and the expression of views opposed to the established political, social or economic system will no longer incur the penalty of imprisonment.

While noting these indications, the Committee hopes that the bill will be adopted in the near future and that the legislation governing the press and audiovisual communication sectors will be amended in such a way that no penalty including compulsory labour may be imposed as punishment for expressing political opinions or for peacefully expressing opposition to the established political, social or economic system. Pending this revision, the Committee requests the Government to continue to supply information on the application in practice of Acts Nos 60-12, 97-010, 84-007, 69-22 and Ordinance No. 69-22/PR/MJL by the national judicial authorities, including the penalties imposed.

Article 1(c). Imposition of forced labour as a means of labour discipline. The Committee again notes the Government's statement that the Merchant Shipping Code has been submitted to the National Assembly for adoption and that sections 215, 235 and 238 of the Code of 1968 will be amended to take account of the Committee's comments. While noting these indications, the Committee expresses the strong hope that the Merchant Shipping Code will be adopted in the very near future, and that it will not contain provisions allowing the imposition of prison sentences involving the obligation to work for breaches of labour discipline where they do not endanger the safety of the vessel or the life or health of persons. The Government is requested to send a copy of the new Merchant Shipping Code once it has been adopted.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

Article 2(2)(c) of the Convention. Hiring of prison labour to private entities. In its previous comments the Committee noted that Decree No. 92-052 of 27 March 1992 issuing the prison regulations (sections 51-56) authorizes the hiring of prison labour to private entities and individuals. It noted that Order No. 213/A/MINAT/DAPEN of 28 July 1988 – which is still in force, according to the Government – establishes a number of conditions concerning the use of prison labour and fixes the rates for their hiring. Those rates include the cost of the daily allowance for a manual worker and a technician, and the surveillance costs. Noting that neither of these legislative texts requires informed, formal consent of the prisoner hired to private enterprises and/or individuals, the Committee has been asking the Government for several years to take the necessary steps to incorporate the requirement for consent into the legislation. The Committee further notes that the Government has already indicated its commitment to ensuring that the regulations implementing the 1992 Decree issuing the prison regulations establish the requirement for formal consent to be given by convicted prisoners before performing any work for private entities, even indicating in its 2009 report that the issue had been examined in conjunction with the Ministry of Territorial Administration and Decentralization at the last session of the National Labour Advisory Commission.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its last report that the regulations implementing the Decree issuing the prison regulations have not been adopted, and it refers to an instruction from the Prime Minister for conducting discussions on the setting up of an agency for the operation of prisons which would take account of ILO concerns.

The Committee recalls once again that, in a setting of captivity, it is necessary to obtain the informed, formal consent of prisoners for work in cases where such work is performed for private individuals, enterprises or associations. The Committee further considers that certain factors are required in order to authenticate or confirm the giving of free and informed consent, and that the most reliable indicator of the voluntary nature of labour is that the work is performed under conditions which approximate to a free labour relationship. The Committee expresses its firm hope that the Government will take all the necessary steps in order to ensure, both in law and in practice, that free, formal and informed consent is given by convicts to work for private entities. To this end, it expects the Government to adopt, in the very near future, the regulations setting out the requirements for such consent and to ensure conditions which approximate a free labour relationship in terms of remuneration, hours of work and occupational safety and health.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Central African Republic

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Idleness, active population and compulsory activities. For many years, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the need to formally repeal certain provisions of the national legislation which are contrary to the Convention inasmuch as they constitute a direct or indirect compulsion to work:

- Ordinance No. 66/004 of 8 January 1966 with respect to the suppression of idleness, as amended by Ordinance No. 72/083 of 18 October 1972, under which any able-bodied person aged between 18 and 55 years who cannot prove that she or he is engaged in a normal activity providing for her or his subsistence or that she or he is engaged in studies is considered to be idle and liable to a penalty of between one and three years of imprisonment;
- Ordinance No. 66/038 of June 1966 respecting the supervision of the active population, under which any person aged between 18 and 55 years who cannot justify belonging to one of the eight categories of the active population shall be called up to cultivate land designated by the administrative authorities and shall also be considered a vagabond if apprehended outside her or his sous-préfecture of origin and shall be liable to a sentence of imprisonment;
- Ordinance No. 75/005 of 5 January 1975 obliging all citizens to provide proof of the exercise of a commercial, agricultural or pastoral activity and making persons in violation of this provision liable to the most severe penalties; and
- section 28 of Act No. 60/109 of 27 June 1960 with respect to the development of the rural economy, under which minimum surfaces for cultivation are to be established for each rural community.

In its latest report, the Government indicates that it has decided to hold an inter-ministerial meeting with a view to sensitizing the ministers who initiated these texts about the necessity of repealing them. For practical reasons, this meeting could not be organized; nevertheless, the Labour Administration would spare no effort to bring about the repeal of the aforementioned texts. The Committee takes note of this information. This matter has been the subject of its comments for many years and the Committee expresses the firm hope that the inter-ministerial meeting to which the Government refers will very soon be held, and that it will lead to concrete proposals for the repeal of these texts, which are contrary to the Convention and which, although having fallen into disuse, remain in the national legislative scheme.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1964)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Imposition of imprisonment involving an obligation to work as a sanction for expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social and economic system. 1. In its previous comments, the Committee recalled that the Convention prohibits to impose sanctions involving an obligation to perform labour, including compulsory prison labour, on persons who, without having recourse to violence, hold or express political views, or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. Considering that section 62 of Order No. 2772, of 18 August 1955, regulating the functioning of penal institutions and the work of detainees, provides for the obligation to work in prison, prison sentences imposed on persons who express certain political opinions or their opposition to the established system will have an impact on the application of the Convention.

In this context, the Committee has been drawing for many years the Government's attention to the need to amend or repeal the provisions of Act No. 60/169 of 12 December 1960 (dissemination of prohibited publications liable to prejudice the development of the Central African nation) and Order No. 3-MI of 25 April 1969 (dissemination of periodicals or news of foreign origin not approved by the censorship authority), which provide for sentences of imprisonment that involve compulsory labour. The Committee notes that, according to the concluding observations of the United Nations Human Rights Committee on the Application of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights by Central African Republic, Order No. 05.002 of 22 February 2005, promulgating the Freedom of the Press and Communication (Organization) Act, is likely to decriminalize press offences. The Committee notes that the "Committee nevertheless observes with concern that many journalists have been subjected to pressure, intimidation or acts of aggression, and even imprisonment" (Document CCPR/C/CAF/CO/2 of 27 July 2006). The Committee asks the Government to provide a copy of Order No. 05.002 promulgating the Freedom of the Press and Communication (Organization) Act and to indicate whether this new legislation has repealed Act No. 60/169 of 12 December 1960 and Order No. 3-MI of 25 April 1969. If not, please indicate the progress made in the process of repealing of these texts, to which the Government has been referring for a long time. Finally, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would indicate the legal provisions under which journalists have been imprisoned and the charges.

2. In order to ascertain that no sentences involving the obligation to work are imposed on persons who, without having recourse to violence, express political opinions or views opposed to the established political, social or economic system, the Committee needs to be able to assess the scope of the provisions mentioned below and to this end it would be grateful if the Government would provide copies of any court decisions handed down under these provisions:

- Section 77 of the Penal Code (dissemination of propaganda for certain purposes; acts jeopardizing public safety, etc.) and sections 130–135 and 137–139 of the Penal Code (offences against persons occupying various public offices), which provide for prison sentences involving the obligation to work.
- Section 3 of Act No. 61/233 governing associations in the Central African Republic read in conjunction with section 12. Under section 12, the “founders, directors, administrators or members of any association that is unlawfully maintained or reconstituted after the act of dissolution” shall be liable to imprisonment. Under section 3 of this Act, any association which is “of such a nature as to give rise to political disturbances or cast discredit on political institutions and their functioning” shall be null and void.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Chad

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 2(2)(a) of the Convention. Work in the general interest imposed in the context of compulsory military service. The Committee notes Ordinance No. 001/PCE/CEDNACVG/91 organizing the armed forces, that according to military service is compulsory for every citizen of Chad. Under section 14 of the Ordinance, conscripts who are fit for service are classified into two categories: the first, the size of which is determined each year by decree, is incorporated and compelled to perform active service; the second remains at the disposal of the military authorities for two years and may be called up to perform work in the general interest by order of the Government. The Committee notes that similar provisions were contained in Ordinance No. 2 of 1961 on the organization and recruitment of the armed forces of the Republic, on which it commented for many years. Indeed, such provisions are not compatible with Article 2(2)(a), of the Convention, under which, to be excluded from the scope of the Convention, any work or service exacted in virtue of compulsory military service laws must be of a purely military character. The Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures to bring the provisions of section 14 of the Ordinance of 1991 reorganizing the armed forces and, as appropriate, any decrees issued thereunder, into conformity with the Convention.

Article 2(2)(c). For many years, the Committee has been drawing the Government’s attention to the need to amend or repeal section 2 of Act No. 14 of 13 November 1959 authorizing the Government to take administrative measures for the relocation, internment or expulsion of persons whose activities constitute a danger for public order and security, under which persons convicted of penal offences involving prohibition of residence may be used for work in the public interest for a period, the duration of which is to be determined by order of the Prime Minister. This provision would allow the administrative authorities to impose work on persons subject to a prohibition of residence once they have completed their sentence. The Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures without further delay to amend or repeal section 2 of Act No. 14 of 13 November 1959 referred to above.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report has not been received. The Committee recalls that, in its previous comments, it drew attention to the need to amend or repeal a number of texts that were inconsistent with the Convention – some of which were fairly old and were deemed by the Government to be obsolete. The Committee reminds the Government that it may call on the Office for technical assistance, and trusts that in its next report the Government will be in a position to inform that specific measures have been taken in response to the comments the Committee has been making for many years.

Article 2(2)(a) of the Convention. 1. Work exacted under compulsory military service laws. The Committee has on several occasions stressed the need to amend Act No. 16 of 27 August 1981 establishing compulsory military service. According to section 1 of the Act, national service is instituted for the purpose of enabling every citizen to participate in the defence and construction of the nation and has two components: military service and civic service. The Committee drew the Government’s attention to the fact that work exacted from recruits as part of compulsory national service, including work related to national development, is not purely military in nature and is therefore contrary to Article 2(2)(a) of the Convention. Noting the Government’s earlier statement that the practice of imposing on recruits work which is not purely military in nature has fallen into disuse and that it intended to repeal Act No. 16 of 1981 on compulsory national service, the Committee trusts that the necessary steps will be taken very shortly to amend or repeal this Act so as to bring the legislation into line with the Convention.

2. Youth brigades and workshops. The Committee observes that the Government has never provided information on the practical effect given to Act No. 31-80 of 16 December 1980 on guidance for youth under which the party and mass organizations were gradually to create all the conditions for the formation of youth brigades and the organization of youth workshops (type of tasks performed, number of persons involved, duration and conditions of their participation, etc.). However, the Government did indicate earlier that since 1991 such practices had fallen into disuse. The Committee points out that this Act has never been formally repealed and asks the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to repeal it.

Article 2(2)(d). Requisitioning of persons to perform community work in instances other than emergencies. In the comments it has been making for very many years, the Committee has pointed out that Act No. 24-60 of 11 May 1960 is inconsistent with the Convention in that it allows the requisitioning of persons to perform community work in instances other than the emergencies provided for under Article 2(2)(d) of the Convention, and provides that persons requisitioned who refuse to work are liable to a penalty of imprisonment of from one month to one year. The Committee notes the Government's earlier statement that this Act has fallen into disuse, and once again urges the Government to take the necessary steps to have it repealed formally so as to avoid any uncertainty in law.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Democratic Republic of the Congo

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Forced labour and sexual slavery in the context of an armed conflict.

The Committee notes the different reports of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights and of the special rapporteurs on the situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. These reports highlight the gravity of the human rights situation in the country – both in the zones where hostilities have resumed and in areas that have not been affected by the conflict – and refer to violations committed by the state security forces and other armed groups, including cases of forced labour and sexual slavery. The Committee notes that in the second joint report of seven United Nations experts on the situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the experts noted that the mines in the Kivu continue to be exploited by armed groups, especially the Armed Forces of the Democratic Republic of the Congo (FARDC) and expressed their concern at “reports that civilians are still subjected to forced labour, extortion and illegal taxation, and that sexual exploitation of women and girls is rife in these mining areas”. The Committee also notes that, according to this report, “women and girls have been abducted and held as sexual slaves both by FARDC members and other armed actors, and have been subject to collective rapes for weeks and months, often accompanied by additional atrocities” (document A/HRC/13/63 of 8 March 2010). Considering the gravity of the facts, the Committee expresses its deep concern and urges the Government to take all the urgent and necessary measures to bring an immediate end to these practices which constitute a most serious violation of the Convention, and to ensure that adequate sanctions are imposed on perpetrators.

Article 25. Penal sanctions. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, under section 323 of the Labour Code, any infringement of section 2.3, which prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labour, shall be punished by a maximum of six months' imprisonment plus a fine or by only one of these penalties, without prejudice to criminal legislation laying down more severe penalties. Emphasizing that the sanctions envisaged in the Labour Code are not very dissuasive, the Committee asked the Government to specify the penal provisions which prohibit and penalize recourse to forced labour. The Committee notes that the Government has not provided any information in this regard. It also notes that the 1940 Penal Code (as amended up to 2004) does not appear to include such provisions. The Committee asks the Government to take the necessary measures to include in the penal legislation provisions establishing adequate sanctions for persons who exact forced labour, in accordance with Article 25 of the Convention. It also requests the Government to indicate how, in practice, the authorities institute legal proceedings and punish persons who exact forced labour.

Abrogation of legislation allowing for the exaction of work for national development purposes, as a means of levying taxes and by persons in preventive detention. For several years, the Committee has been requesting the Government to amend or repeal the following legislative texts and regulations, which are contrary to the Convention:

- Act No. 76-011 of 21 May 1976 concerning national development efforts and its Implementing Order, Departmental Order No. 00748/BCE/AGRI/76 of 11 June 1976 concerning the performance of civic tasks in the context of the national food production programme: these legal texts, which aim to increase productivity in all sectors of national life, require, subject to penal sanctions, every able-bodied adult person who is not already considered to be making his contribution by reason of his employment (political representatives, employed persons and apprentices, public servants, traders, members of the liberal professions, the clergy, students and pupils) to carry out agricultural and other development work as decided by the Government;
- Legislative Ordinance No. 71/087 of 14 September 1971 on the minimum personal contribution, sections 18 to 21 which provide for imprisonment involving compulsory labour, upon decision of the chief of the local community or the area commissioner, of taxpayers who have defaulted on their minimum personal contributions.

The Committee previously noted the Government's reiterated indications, first referring to draft amendments to these texts and then indicating that they have lapsed and have therefore been repealed in practice. In its report, the Government again indicates that these texts are no longer applied. In reply to the Committee's request to formally repeal these texts to provide guarantees of legal security, the Government indicates that legal security is ensured by both the 2006 Constitution and the 2002 Labour Code, which prohibit the use of forced labour, and by section 332 of the Labour Code, which provides that all the previous conflicting provisions are repealed and replaced, and that only the institutions, procedures and regulations which do not conflict with the new Labour Code still remain in force. The Committee notes the Government's view, according to which legal security is not compromised by the absence of the formal repeal of these texts.

With reference to Ordinance No. 15/APAJ of 20 January 1938 concerning the prison system in indigenous districts, which allows work to be exacted from detainees who have not been convicted, the Government indicates that detainees who have not been convicted are only subject to the obligation to clean their cells and sanitary installations. The Committee expresses the hope that during the next revision on the penal legislation or on the regulations on the prison system, the Government will take the necessary measures to repeal Ordinance No. 15/APAJ of 20 January 1938 which is not in the list of texts that have been repealed by Ordinance No. 344 of 15 September 1965 respecting prison labour.

[The Government is asked to supply full particulars to the Conference at its 100th Session and to reply in detail to the present comments in 2011.]

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1(1) and 2(1), (2)(a) and (d) of the Convention. National service obligations. In its earlier comments, the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures with a view to repeal or amend the National Service Act, 1977, under which persons between the ages of 18 and 21 years are required to perform service with the national service, including participation in development and self-help projects concerning housing, school, construction, agriculture and road building, failure to do so being punishable with a fine and imprisonment (section 35(2)). The Committee observed that, contrary to the Government's repeated statement that the national service was created to respond to national disasters, the Act contained no reference to natural disasters, but specified the objectives of the national service, which "shall be to mobilize the energies of the people of Dominica to the fullest possible level of efficiency, to shape and direct those energies to promoting the growth and economic development of the State". The Committee also referred to Article 1(b) of the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), likewise ratified by Dominica, which specifically prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labour "as a means of mobilizing and using labour for purposes of economic development".

While noting the Government's previous indication that the National Service Act, 1977, has been omitted from the Revised Laws of Dominica, 1990, as well as the Government's repeated indications in its previous reports that section 35(2) of the Act has not been applied in practice, the Committee expresses firm hope that appropriate measures will be taken in the near future in order to formally repeal the above Act so as to bring national legislation into conformity with Conventions Nos 29 and 105 and that the Government will provide, in its next report, information on the progress made in this regard.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1955)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Use of conscripts for non-military purposes. For a number of years, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the provisions of section 1 of Act No. 76 of 1973, as amended by Act No. 98 of 1975, concerning general (civic) service, under which young persons, male and female, who have completed their studies and who are surplus to the requirements of the armed forces, may be directed to work, such as the development of rural and urban societies, agricultural and consumers' cooperative associations and work in production units of factories. The Committee considered that these provisions were incompatible both with the present Convention and the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), which provides for the abolition of any form of compulsory labour as a means of mobilizing and using labour for purposes of economic development.

The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that a proposal had been submitted to the Committee on Law Revision at the Ministry of Social Solidarity to amend the Act on general (civic) service so as to provide for the voluntary nature of the service.

In its report, the Government once again indicates that general (civic) service is voluntary and that it does not include any compulsion or obligation, since the law does not provide for any penalty to be imposed on those who do not perform it. The Committee notes the statistics concerning the number of persons recruited for general (civic) service, as well as the number of persons exempted during the period from 2000 to 2009. It also notes the Government's indication in its report received in 2009 that the amendment of the Act is still under discussion.

Noting that the Government's latest report contains no new information on the revision of the Act concerning general (civic) service, the Committee reiterates the firm hope that this Act will soon be revised by clearly providing that participation of young persons in the general (civic) service is voluntary, in order to ensure the observance of the forced labour Conventions. Pending the revision, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the application of the above legislation in practice, including information on the number of persons who have applied for exemption from such service and the number of those whose applications have been refused.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1958)

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its latest report that the information previously requested will be provided as soon as it is communicated by the competent authorities. Noting that the Government's report contains no further information in response to its earlier comments, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will provide, with its next report, detailed information as regards the following points:

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for expressing political views opposed to the established system. In its previous comments, the Committee drew the Government's attention to certain provisions of the Penal Code, the Public Meetings Act of 1923, the Meetings Act of 1914 and Act No. 40 of 1977 respecting political parties, which provide for penal sanctions involving compulsory labour in circumstances falling within the scope of Article 1(a) of the Convention:

- sections 98(a)bis and (d) of the Penal Code, as amended by Act No. 34 of 24 May 1970, which prohibit the following: advocacy, by any means, of opposition to the fundamental principles of the socialist system of the State; encouraging aversion or contempt for these principles; encouraging calls to oppose the union of the people's working forces; constituting or participating in any association or group pursuing any of the foregoing aims, or receiving any material assistance for the pursuit of such aims;
- sections 98(b), 98(b)bis and 174 of the Penal Code concerning advocacy of certain doctrines;
- the Public Meetings Act 1923, and the Meetings Act 1914, granting general powers to prohibit or dissolve meetings, even in private places;
- sections 4 and 26 of Act No. 40/1977 respecting political parties, as amended by Act No. 177/2005, which prohibit the creation of political parties whose objectives are in conflict with the requirement of preserving national unity, social peace or the democratic system.

In its 2009 report, the Government indicates that, according to sections 98(a)bis and 98(d) of the Penal Code, sentences of imprisonment involving compulsory labour only apply for the establishment or participation in an association or organization by any means, in opposition to the fundamental principles of the socialist system of the State, and not for the peaceful expression of political views opposed to the established political system. In this regard, the Committee recalls, referring to the explanations provided in paragraphs 154, 162 and 163 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, that the opinions and views ideologically opposed to the established system are often expressed in different kinds of meetings or through political parties or associations. The Committee also notes that the above provisions of the Penal Code are not limited to the establishment or participation in such associations or groups, but are as well applied to acts such as the advocacy, by any means, of opposition to the fundamental principles of the socialist system of the State, encouraging aversion or contempt for these principles.

Concerning sections 98(b), 98(b)bis and 174 of the Penal Code as regards the advocacy of certain doctrines, the Government indicates in its 2009 report, that the sentences of imprisonment involving compulsory labour are only applicable against the advocacy of certain doctrines aimed at changing the fundamental principles of the Constitution or the social order, by the use of force or other unlawful means.

While noting this information, the Committee observes that the application of these provisions is not limited to acts of violence (or incitement to violence), armed resistance or uprising, but seems to allow punishment involving the obligation to work to be imposed for the peaceful expression of opinions contrary to the Government's policy and the established political system.

The Committee therefore hopes that the necessary measures will be taken to bring these provisions into conformity with the Convention, e.g. by clearly limiting their application to acts of violence or incitement to violence. Pending the amendment, the Committee again requests the Government to provide information on the application of these provisions in practice, supplying sample copies of the relevant court decisions and indicating the penalties imposed.

The Committee takes note of the Government's explanations in its 2009 report according to which Act No. 14 of 1923 (Public Meetings Act) and Act No. 10 of 1914 (Meetings Act) provide for sentences of imprisonment not exceeding six months in case of disruptive meetings conducted without prior authorization. The Committee requests the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the application in practice of the above provisions, supplying copies of relevant court decisions and indicating the penalties imposed.

Regarding the amendment of Act No. 40/1977 concerning political parties by Act No. 177/2005, the Committee notes that the new version of section 4, paragraph 2, prohibits the establishment of political parties in conflict with the requirements of preserving national unity, social peace and the democratic system, and that any act of this kind is subject to a sentence of imprisonment that could involve an obligation to work. The Committee observes that this provision is defined in such general terms that it could be used as a means of punishing the expression of views and may raise questions about its compatibility with the Convention. It therefore requests the Government to provide information on the application of the above provision in practice that could define or illustrate its scope.

Article 1(b). Use of conscripts for purposes of economic development. The Committee refers in this connection to its observation addressed to the Government under the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), likewise ratified by Egypt.

Article 1(d). Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for participation in strikes. The Committee also noted the Government's indications that sentences of imprisonment imposed under sections 124, 124A, 124C and 374 of the Penal Code on public employees participating in strikes could range from three months to one year, constituting a "simple imprisonment" which does not involve an obligation to work. The Committee also noted that according to article 20 of the Penal Code, the judge may pass a sentence of imprisonment with an obligation to work if the term of imprisonment is one year, which is the maximum term under section 124, paragraph 1. As regards the provision of section 124, paragraph 2, which provides for the possibility of doubling the term of imprisonment, this provision is not compatible with the Convention. The Committee recalls that the Convention lays down a generally worded prohibition to have recourse to any form of forced or compulsory labour "as a punishment for having participated in strikes". It points out however that the Convention does not prohibit the punishment of acts of violence, assault or destruction of property committed in connection with the strike. The Committee therefore reiterates the firm hope that the adequate measures will be taken to bring the above provisions into conformity with the Convention, by ensuring that no sanctions involving compulsory labour are imposed for the mere participation in a strike. The Committee hopes that, pending the amendment of the legislation, the Government will provide copies of court decisions passed under the abovementioned sections of the Penal Code, if and when such decisions become available.

Article 1(c) and (d). Sanctions involving compulsory labour applicable to seafarers. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to sections 13(5) and 14 of the Maintenance of Security, Order and Discipline (Merchant Navy) Act 1960, under which penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) may be imposed on seafarers who together commit repeated acts of insubordination. The Committee recalled in this connection that Article 1(c) and (d) of the Convention prohibits the exaction of forced or compulsory labour as a means of labour discipline or as punishment for having participated in strikes. The Committee observed that, in order to remain outside the scope of the Convention, punishment should be linked to acts that endanger or are likely to endanger the safety of the vessel or the life or health of persons.

The Committee previously noted the Government's indication in its report that the above Act was being amended. Since the Government's latest report contains no new information on this matter, the Committee trusts that, in the course of the revision, the provisions of the 1960 Act will be brought into conformity with the Convention and that the Government will supply a copy of the amended text, as soon as it is adopted.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1958)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1(a), (c) and (d) of the Convention. 1. In comments made for a considerable number of years, the Committee has referred to provisions of the Criminal Code, the Newspaper Licensing Decree, 1973, the Merchant Shipping Act, 1963, the Protection of Property (Trade Disputes) Ordinance and the Industrial Relations Act, 1965, under which imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour) may be imposed as a punishment for non-observance of restrictions imposed by discretionary decision of the executive on the publication of newspapers and the carrying on of associations, for various breaches of discipline in the merchant marine and for participation in certain forms of strikes. Having requested the Government to adopt the necessary measures in regard to these provisions to ensure that no form of forced or compulsory labour (including compulsory prison labour) might be exacted in circumstances falling within Article 1(a), (c) or (d) of the Convention, the Committee noted the Government's statement that the National Advisory Committee on Labour was discussing the comments of the Committee of Experts and that it was the wish of the Government to bring the legislation concerned into conformity with the Convention. The Government also indicated in its report received in 1996 that the National Advisory Committee on Labour concluded discussions on the Committee of Experts' comments and submitted recommendations to the Minister in March 1994 designed to bring domestic legislation into conformity with ILO standards, and the comments of the Committee of Experts had been submitted to the Attorney-General for a closer study and expert comments.

The Government has previously indicated that the action of the Attorney-General to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention in accordance with the recommendations of the National Advisory Committee on Labour has been halted in view of the proposed review and codification of the labour laws. It has also indicated that the tripartite National Forum that includes representatives of the Attorney-General's Office, the National Advisory Committee on Labour and the employers' and workers' organizations, would consider the comments made by the Committee of Experts regarding the application of the Convention.

2. The Government indicates in its latest report that the National Forum has already codified all the country's labour laws into a single labour bill, which is being considered by the Cabinet and will be forwarded to Parliament to be passed into law. The Committee expresses firm hope that the necessary action will at last be taken on the various points which are once again recalled in detail in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee previously noted the adoption of the Political Parties Law, 1992, the Emergency Powers Act, 1994, and the Public Order Act, 1994, which gave rise to a number of questions under the Convention that are also reiterated in the request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Trafficking in persons. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to observations received from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), which contained allegations that there was evidence of trafficking for forced prostitution and for child prostitution in cities and remote gold mining areas.

The Committee notes the adoption of the Combating of Trafficking in Persons Act, 2005, as well as the Government's indication in the report that 300 volunteers have been trained to identify cases of trafficking. The Committee would appreciate it if the Government would provide information on the following matters:

- the activities of the task force to develop and implement a national plan for the prevention of trafficking in persons, to which reference is made in section 30 of the above Act, supplying copies of any relevant reports, studies and inquiries, as well as a copy of the National Plan;
- statistical data on trafficking which is collected and published by the Ministry of Home Affairs in virtue of section 31 of the Act;
- any legal proceedings which have been instituted as a consequence of the application of section 3(1) of the 2005 Act on penalties, supplying copies of the relevant court decisions and indicating the penalties imposed, as well as the information on measures taken to ensure that this provision is strictly enforced against perpetrators, as required by Article 25 of the Convention.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Haiti

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1958)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. In its previous comments, the Committee has examined the situation of children employed as domestic servants in conditions of forced labour. Considering that Haiti has ratified the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), the Committee refers to its comments under this later Convention. Regarding the issue of trafficking in persons, the Committee repeats its previous comments which read as follows:

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Trafficking in persons. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the report by the Research Mission of the General Secretariat of the Organization of American States (OAS) on the situation regarding the trafficking in persons in Haiti, dated September 2006, which emphasized a trend towards the systematic organization of trafficking in persons in Haiti, which can be explained by the deterioration of the socioeconomic and political situation in the country over recent years which precludes an effective response to the basic needs of the population and paves the way for an increase in all forms of human exploitation and unlawful economic activity.

In its latest report, the Government mentions the implementation of a plan which includes increasing the number of police officers at the border with the Dominican Republic with a view to preventing illegal crossings and at the same time reducing the trafficking of children and persons in general. The Government also mentions the drafting of two bills aimed at protecting the victims of trafficking, in particular children. The Government indicates that the National Migration Office assists Haitians who have been turned away at the border in returning to their community with the help of public aid. Finally, the Government indicates that the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour, together with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, is currently studying the problem of the exploitation of persons in the Dominican Republic on sugar cane plantations and the reduction of children to begging in that country and intends to hold bilateral talks aimed at solving this problem.

The Committee notes the concluding observations of the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (see document CEDAW/C/HTI/CO/7, 10 February 2009, paragraph 27) urging the Government "to intensify its efforts to combat all forms of trafficking in women and girls". It notes that the UN Committee also asks the Government "to expedite adoption of the draft bill on all forms of trafficking and to ensure that the new law allows prosecution and punishment of perpetrators, effective protection of victims and adequate redress". Finally, it notes that the UN Committee encourages the Government "to conduct research on the root causes of trafficking and to enhance bilateral and multilateral cooperation with neighbouring countries, in particular the Dominican Republic, to prevent trafficking and bring perpetrators to justice".

The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the draft laws mentioned in the Government's report, in particular the draft law on trafficking. Please provide a copy of the texts concerned as soon as they have been adopted. In addition to the legislative measures taken, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on other measures taken to combat the trafficking in persons, in particular: repressive measures (including statistics on the number of cases of trafficking examined by the authorities and the number of sentences imposed by the courts); public awareness raising, with a special emphasis on those most vulnerable; and assistance for victims. Please also provide information concerning the measures taken and results achieved with regard to bilateral and multilateral cooperation with neighbouring countries, in particular the Dominican Republic.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Hungary

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1956)

Article 2(2)(c) of the Convention. 1. Work of prisoners for private companies. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the national provisions allowing the law enforcement authorities to conclude agreements with private companies concerning the work of prisoners (section 101(3) of Order No. 6/1996 (VII 12) of the Ministry of Justice on the implementation of provisions concerning prison sentences and detention). The Committee noted the Government's indications in its reports that prisoners are in a legal relationship with a penitentiary institution and are not directly employed by a third party, and perform labour under the supervision and control of the law enforcement bodies. The Committee also noted that prisoners' conditions of work are governed by the general provisions of labour law (subject to certain deviations). Recalling that Article 2(2)(c) of the Convention expressly prohibits that convicted prisoners are hired to or placed at the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations, the Committee asked the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure observance of the Convention, such as, e.g., to provide that any prisoners working for private companies offer themselves voluntarily, without being subjected to pressure or the threat of any penalty, and subject to guarantees as to wages and other conditions of employment approximating a free employment relationship.

The Committee notes the Government's clarifications as regards the interpretation of section 33(1)(d) of Law-Decree No. 11 (1979) on the execution of prison sentences, according to which convicts have to carry out their work assignments given to them in accordance with their vocational qualifications and abilities. The Government indicates that, in practice, only those convicts who expressly ask for a job may be given work assignments, a number of job opportunities being always lower than the number of convicts applying for a job. In other words, convicts do not have an obligation to work, but work may be assigned to them according to their choice. In order to get a work assignment, convicts shall apply for a particular job by signing an application form, which should be examined by admission and employment committees of penitentiary institutions. The Government states that convicts are free to apply for work with private companies following the above procedure, without being forced to do so and without any threat of punishment for refusal. It also confirms its earlier indications that prisoners are guaranteed to work under conditions approximating a free employment relationship, as regards occupational safety and health, working time and rest periods, paid leave, etc. Regarding remuneration for work, the amount of wages payable to convicts may not be lower than one third of the minimum wage, if they have worked full time and have met the performance requirements up to 100 per cent (section 124(3) of Order No. 6/1996 (VII 12) of the Ministry of Justice referred to above). Convicts are also entitled to a wide range of health-care provisions and accident-related benefits within the scope of social security benefits (section 16(1)(n) of Act LXXX of 1997 on the eligibility for social security benefits). The Government further states that convicts are allowed to learn new skills and, as far as possible, perform work of the same type as they use to do before conviction.

While noting this information, the Committee hopes that, in the course of the preparation of the comprehensive amendment of Law-Decree No. 11 of 1979 on the execution of prison sentences, referred to in the Government's earlier report, the necessary measures will be taken in order to include into the revised legislation a provision requiring free and informed consent for the work of prisoners for private companies, both inside and outside prison premises, so as to bring legislation into full conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the progress made in this regard.

2. "Public utility labour" performed by convicted persons placed at the disposal of private parties. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the Penal Code provisions concerning "public utility labour", which shall be performed, as a penal sanction, without deprivation of a person's freedom and without remuneration, but may be replaced by confinement in prison, if the convicted person fails to fulfil his or her labour obligations (sections 49–50 of the Penal Code). The Committee noted the Government's indications that the work to be performed as "public utility labour" must be of public interest and that the employer (which may be a public institution, or a private business organization) shall observe the safety provisions and ensure the same working conditions as those enjoyed by workers employed on a basis of a contract.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the law does not contain any express provisions concerning the voluntary informed consent of the person concerned to perform community service, nor does it offer an opportunity to a convicted person to choose between community service and confinement in prison. The Government indicates that the penitentiary administrator and the probation service should keep a register of institutions and business organizations that need the work of persons sentenced to community service (Decree No. 9/2002 (IV.9) of the Ministry of Justice). The Committee notes the Government's indication in the report that, according to a 2008 study, probation officers approached municipal bodies or institutions to employ convicts in 60 per cent of cases, private business organizations in 10.9 per cent of cases and various non-public associations and foundations in 9.3 per cent of cases. The Government confirms that community service is performed in the public interest and not for profit.

While noting this information, and referring to point 1 of the present observation, the Committee recalls that Article 2(2)(c) of the Convention expressly prohibits that convicted persons are placed at the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations. Referring to the explanations contained in paragraphs 123–128 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, the Committee hopes that, in the course of the revision of penitentiary legislation, the necessary measures will be taken to introduce a requirement of the informed voluntary consent of convicted persons sentenced to community service to work for a private employer. It requests the Government to indicate, in its next report, the progress achieved in this regard. Pending the adoption of such measures, please continue to provide information on the practical implementation of special programmes for carrying out “public utility labour” including a list of authorized associations or institutions using such labour and giving examples of the type of work involved.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and (2)(c) of the Convention. Work of prisoners for private companies. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to section 155(2) of the Correctional Institution (Adult Correction Centre) Rules of 1991, under which no inmate may be employed in the service of, or for the private benefit of, any person, except with the authority of the Commissioner or in pursuance of special rules. The Committee noted that, under section 60(b) of the Corrections Act, as amended by the Corrections (Amendment) Act, 1995, the Minister may establish programmes under which persons serving a sentence in a correctional institution may be directed by the superintendent to undertake work in any company or organization approved by the Commissioner, subject to such provisions as may be prescribed relating to their employment, discipline and control, and such work may be within the centre or institution or outside its limits. The Committee also noted the information concerning the functioning of the Correctional Services Production Company (COSPROD), as well as the Government’s repeated statement that, under this programme, some inmates had been working under the conditions of a freely accepted employment relationship, with their formal consent and subject to guarantees regarding the payment of normal wages.

The Committee notes the Government’s statement in its latest report that the Department of Correctional Services has not yet entered into any discussion regarding a change in a policy for the issues raised. The Government confirms its previous indication that there is no activity which is undertaken through forced labour and that participation of inmates in the work on farms managed by COSPROD is voluntary.

The Committee expresses the firm hope, referring also to the explanations provided in paragraphs 59–60 and 114–120 of its General Survey of 2007 on the eradication of forced labour, that section 155(2) of the Correctional Institution (Adult Correction Centre) Rules, will be amended so as to ensure that no prisoners may work for private individuals, companies, etc., except where they do so voluntarily, with their free and formal consent and under conditions approximating a free labour relationship, which include wage levels (leaving room for deductions and attachments), social security and occupational safety and health, in order to bring this provision into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice. The Committee again requests the Government to provide a copy of any special rules referred to in the above section 155(2) and to continue to provide information on its application in practice, pending the amendment.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1962)

Article 1(c) and (d) of the Convention. Disciplinary measures applicable to seafarers. For a number of years, the Committee has been referring to the following provisions of the Jamaica Shipping Act, 1998, under which certain disciplinary offences are punishable with imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour under the Prisons Law):

- section 178(1)(b), (c) and (e), which provides for penalties of imprisonment, inter alia, for wilful disobedience or neglect of duty or combining with any of the crews to impede the progress of the voyage; an exemption from this liability applies only to seafarers participating in a lawful strike after the ship has arrived and has been secured in good safety to the satisfaction of the master at a port, and only at a port in Jamaica (section 178(2)); and
- section 179(a) and (b), which punishes, with similar penalties, the offences of desertion and absence without leave.

The Committee recalls, referring to paragraphs 179–181 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, that provisions under which penalties of imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour) may be imposed for desertion, absence without leave or disobedience, are incompatible with the Convention. Only sanctions relating to acts that are likely to endanger the safety of the ship, or the life or health of persons (e.g. as provided for in section 177 of the 1998 Shipping Act) have no bearing on the Convention.

The Committee previously noted the Government’s indication that the Maritime Authority had given written instructions to the Attorney General’s department and the office of the Parliamentary Council to amend the above sections of the Shipping Act, 1998, in order to make its provisions compatible with the Convention. In its latest report, the Government confirms that an opinion has been received by the Attorney General’s chambers recommending that amendments be made to the Shipping Act to bring it into conformity with the Convention. The Government also states that the office of the Parliamentary Council is to be instructed to make the amendments to the relevant legislation accordingly.

The Committee expresses the firm hope that the necessary measures will at last be taken to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention, e.g. by limiting the scope of the relevant provisions of the Shipping Act, 1998, as indicated above, and that the Government will soon be in a position to report the progress made in this regard.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1932)

I. Referring to its earlier comments, the Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its reports received on 13 and 30 September 2010, as well as in the Government's communications received in November 2009 and November 2010.

In its earlier comments, the Committee examined the issues of wartime industrial forced labour and sexual slavery (so-called "comfort women") during the Second World War. It refers in this regard to its earlier considerations and conclusions concerning the limits of its mandate in respect of these historical breaches of the Convention. In its previous observation, the Committee expressed the hope that, in making further efforts to seek reconciliation with the victims, the Government would take measures in the immediate future to respond to the claims of the aged surviving victims. The Government was also requested to continue to provide information about recent judicial decisions and related developments.

The Committee notes communications received in 2009 and 2010 from the following workers' organizations:

- All-Japan Shipbuilding & Engineering Union (AJSEU) (dated 10 August 2009 and 20 August 2010);
- Federation of Korean Trade Unions (FKTU) and the Korean Confederation of Trade Unions (KCTU) (dated 26 August 2009 and 27 August 2010);
- Teachers' Union of Nagoya Municipal High School (dated 12 August 2009 and 20 August 2010);
- National Federation of Construction Engineering Workers' Unions for Japan (JCEW) (dated 18 August 2010);
- International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) (dated 16 September 2009 and 1 September 2010);
- The Netherlands Trade Union Confederation (FNV) (dated 30 August 2010).

Copies of the above communications from workers' organizations were forwarded to the Government for any comments it might wish to make on the matters raised therein. The Committee notes the Government's response to these communications received on 13 September and 19 November 2010.

Some of the above communications of the workers' organizations referred, inter alia, to positive developments, such as settlement of certain forced labour cases. Thus, the Nishimatsu Construction Company, a private company profiting from industrial forced labour during the Second World War, reached an agreement with all 360 former victims of forced labour at the Yasuno Power Plant in Hiroshima Prefecture on 23 October 2009; it also reached an agreement with 183 Chinese victims of forced labour at a power plant in Niigata Prefecture on 26 April 2010. These settlements were reached after the decision of the Supreme Court of Japan of 27 April 2007, according to which Chinese plaintiffs had no legal right to seek compensation for the damages caused by forced labour exacted by the Nishimatsu Construction Company, but the Court suggested in conclusions that the parties involved (the Nishimatsu Company and the Government) take voluntary measures to relieve the pain of the victims. The settlement provides 250 million yen to 360 victims in the Hiroshima case and 128 million yen to 183 victims in the Niigata case.

The communications from the workers' organizations also referred to the issue of military sexual slavery as it continues to be taken up by the United Nations bodies, in particular, in the form of recommendations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW), which examined the issue of "comfort women" at its forty-fourth session (20 July to 7 August 2009). This issue was also referred to in the report of the Special Rapporteur on violence against women, its causes and consequences, submitted to the United Nations Human Rights Council on 23 April 2010 (A/HRC/14/22).

Some of the above communications also referred to resolutions adopted by the local councils of Japan. Since March 2008 and up to August 2010, 30 local councils adopted resolutions urging the Government to solve the Japanese military sexual slavery issue, to restore dignity and justice to the victims, to provide them with compensation, and to further educate the public.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report received on 13 September 2010 that, during the period from 1 June 2008 to 31 May 2010, the courts "pronounced" on two cases regarding the "comfort women" issue (one decision by the Supreme Court and one judgment at the high court level) and on 16 cases regarding "conscripted forced labourers" (six decisions by the Supreme Court, nine judgments at the high court level and one judgment at the district court level), in which the plaintiffs claimed state compensation for damages. The Government states that, in all these cases, the plaintiffs' claims for compensation against the Government of Japan have been dismissed, in accordance with the relevant international agreements and joint communiqués on the settlement of problems. The Government also indicates that, as of 31 May 2010, there were no cases pending in the Japanese courts concerning the "comfort women" issue and only five cases still pending in courts concerning "conscripted forced labourers".

The Committee takes due note of the Government's statement in the report that the Government of Japan has sincerely and faithfully dealt with the issues of reparations, property and claims relating to the Second World War, including those related to the issue of "comfort women", in accordance with its obligations under the San Francisco Peace Treaty, bilateral peace treaties and other relevant treaties and agreements. Concerning, more particularly, the issue of “comfort women”, the Government reiterates that it remains committed to the position expressed in the August 1993 statement of the then Chief Cabinet Secretary, Yohei Kono, where he expressed sincere apologies and remorse to the former “comfort women”, while recognizing that this issue was, with the involvement of the military authorities of the day, a grave affront to the honour and dignity of a large number of women. This statement embodies the Government of Japan’s official position on this matter which remains unchanged. The Government also states that the Government of Japan has since expressed its sincere apologies and remorse on many occasions. In addition, when the activities of the Asian Women’s Fund (AWF) were implemented, the Prime Minister, on behalf of the Government of Japan, sent a letter expressing apologies and remorse directly to each former “comfort woman”.

The Committee previously noted from the Government’s earlier statements in its reports that, with regard to non-legal measures to respond to the claims of surviving victims of wartime industrial forced labour and military sexual slavery and to meet their expectations, the Government has placed emphasis on the AWF and its related activities, an initiative launched in 1995 and continued until the Fund was dissolved in March 2007, after it had completed its objectives. As the Committee has considered in its 2001 and 2003 observations, the rejection by the majority of former “comfort women” of monies from the AWF because it was not seen as compensation from the Government, and the rejection, by some, of the letter sent by the Prime Minister to the few who accepted monies from the Fund as not accepting government responsibility, suggested that this measure had not met the expectations of the majority of the victims. The Committee therefore expressed the hope that the Government would make efforts, in consultation with the surviving victims and the organizations which represent them, to find an alternative way to compensate the victims in a manner that would meet their expectations.

The Committee notes the Government’s statement in its report that it will continue to implement follow-up activities of the AWF. The Government indicates that, as part of such follow-up, the Government of Japan has entrusted the people who were involved in the AWF to implement visiting care activity and group counselling activity (Republic of Korea and the Philippines), as well as exchange of opinions with government officials and academia (Indonesia and the Philippines). The Committee also notes the Government’s statement in its communication received on 19 November 2010, that the Government of Japan is arranging an occasion for a government member in a responsible position to meeting with former “comfort women” to directly convey the views of the Government of Japan and to listen carefully to their current living circumstances, past experiences and their personal sentiments.

Given the serious long-standing nature of the case and noting the abovementioned government indications, the Committee reiterates its hope that, in making these further efforts to seek reconciliation with the victims, the Government will take measures, in the immediate future, to respond to the claims being made by the aged surviving victims of wartime industrial forced labour and military sexual slavery, the number of whom has continued to decline with the passing years. Please provide information, in particular, on the implementation of the follow-up activities of the AWF referred to above and on any other measures, taken or envisaged, including any follow-up to the information received on 19 November 2010.

II. Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Industrial Training and Technical Internship Programme. The Committee notes the communications received from the Labour Union of Migrant Workers dated 26 May and 10 August 2010, which contain information concerning the implementation of the Industrial Training and Technical Internship Programme (“Foreign Trainee” Programme), as well as the Government’s response to these communications dated 15 October 2010.

The Committee notes that the abovementioned programme was established in order to develop the human and industrial resources of developing countries, with the aim of securing the transfer of industrial technology, skills and knowledge. Under this programme, foreign nationals can enter Japan as “trainees” for one year and become “technical interns” for another two years; they are required to go back to their country thereafter. The programme has been monitored by the Japan International Training Cooperation Organization (JITCO), under the supervision of the government organizations concerned, including the Immigration Bureau and labour standards inspection bodies.

Before the revision of the programme in July 2010, foreign trainees were not covered by the labour law and were not considered as workers, but more as students; therefore, they did not receive any wages, but an allowance. According to the allegations contained in the above communications from the Labour Union of Migrant Workers, trainees were extremely vulnerable to employers’ abuses: they were often used as cheap labourers, in violation of the minimum wage law, and were obliged to do unpaid overtime; employers used to confiscate trainees’ and interns’ passports and forced them to put their wages and allowances into saving accounts, partly to prevent them from running away. The Union further alleged that there were also restrictions on the freedom of movement of the trainees, such as a prohibition of mobile phone possession, prohibition of going out, staying out, etc.

The Union has referred in this connection to the concluding observations concerning Japan of the United Nations Human Rights Committee (CCPR/C/JPN/CO/5, 18 December 2008), and the CEDAW (CEDAW/C/JPN/CO/6, 7 August 2009), in which both committees expressed concern about the vulnerable situation of foreign industrial trainees and technical interns, who are often exploited by their employers due to the lack of protection. It has also referred to the report submitted by the Special Rapporteur on trafficking in persons, especially women and children (A/HRC/14/32/Add.4), annexed to the communication dated 10 August 2010, in which the Special Rapporteur recommended, inter alia, that the Government should take full responsibility for the Training and Technical Internship Programme and its monitoring, by creating an independent body with no connection to the participating companies, which should closely supervise such companies and ensure the full respect of the rights of trainees; that a law to better regulate the programme should be adopted; and a hotline and an office to report abuses under this programme should be established.

The Committee further notes that, in its communication dated 10 August 2010, the Union refers in detail to the revised Training and Technical Internship Programme, which was put into effect in July 2010. The revision was based on the amendments made on 15 July 2009 to the Immigration Control and Refugee Recognition Act, which extended the applicability of labour laws to foreign trainees and therefore entitled them to be paid the minimum wage and to have the same labour rights as other Japanese workers. Among other features of the revised programme are the following: reinforcement of guidance, supervision and support system by the accepting organizations, as well as enhanced transparency of management; increased penalties for the organizations violating laws and guidelines, creation of disqualification provisions suspending the right of such organizations to accept trainees (for example, in case of violation of immigration laws or in cases of misconduct, such as, for example, confiscation of passports, non-payment of wages, violation of human rights); prohibition to collect “guarantee money” from trainees, etc.

However, the Union states that it may be premature to assess how effective the above remedies would be, since the accepting organizations still have absolute control over the status of trainees, who are afraid of deportation and have no other option but to accept whatever is available. It also refers to the statistical information published by the JITCO concerning the death of the foreign trainees and technical interns as a result of work-related accidents and diseases in 2009.

In its response to the above communications, the Government states that forced labour is prohibited within the structure of the Training and Technical Internship Programme, that the organizations concerned (including JITCO, the Immigration Bureau and labour standards inspection bodies) have been monitoring the programme in order to prevent any improper cases, and that no cases that might fall under the category of forced labour have been recognized in the course of the operation of the programme. As regards the application of section 5 of the Labour Standards Law, which prohibits the use of forced labour by employers by means of physical violence, intimidation, confinement or any other unfair restraint on the mental or physical freedom of workers, the Government states that there have been no cases of violation of this provision since 1993 (the earliest year to which the labour standards inspection bodies can trace violation data).

The Government indicates, however, that there have been reports on cases in which certain accepting organizations have treated trainees as low-wage labourers, and therefore efforts have been made to identify any misconduct on the part of such organizations and to stop them from receiving trainees. In accordance with the established procedure, when a labour standards inspection office receives allegations from a worker concerning violations of labour laws, such as the non-payment of wages or compulsory savings, the office investigates the facts and, if violations have been proved, it provides guidance to the employers for correcting them and then confirms that corrections have been made by the employers. If the case is considered malicious, a labour standards inspector sends papers to a prosecutor for a violation of the labour law. The Government indicates that, in some cases of this kind, employers have been found guilty and convicted in courts; it refers in this connection to a case described in the Union’s communication dated 26 May 2010, in which the employer was convicted in court and his right to accept trainees was suspended.

The Government further states that, in case of any abuse of human rights, such as violence against trainees or taking custody of their passports, the Immigration Bureau conducts the necessary investigation and, after having recognized a misconduct of relevant organizations or companies, takes measures to suspend their acceptance of trainees and technical interns. As regards information concerning the death of the foreign trainees and technical interns as a result of work-related accidents and diseases, the Government indicates that the labour standards inspection offices have been taking appropriate action, such as conducting investigations into industrial accidents and occupational diseases and providing administrative guidance, as well as sending papers to prosecutors.

As regards the revision of the Training and Technical Internship Programme, which entered into force in July 2010, the Government states that it has strengthened the protection of trainees and technical interns, who have been given a status of residence of “Technical Intern Training” for a maximum period of three years and shall be protected under labour laws and regulations, such as the Labour Standards Law and the Minimum Wage Law, while engaging in skill-building activities under their employment contract. In addition, collection of guarantee money and penalty charges by dispatching organizations and accepting organizations and companies shall be prohibited, and the suspension period during which organizations found guilty of human rights abuses are not allowed to accept technical interns is extended from three years to five years. The Government states that it has also strengthened the system of supervision against violations, through substantial investigations conducted by the Immigration Bureau and administrative guidance provided by the labour standards inspection offices, but also through strengthening on-site guidance by the JITCO and improving a telephone counselling hotline in the native languages of trainees.

The Committee notes this information and requests the Government to continue to provide information on the application in practice of the various measures taken in the course of the revision of the Training and Technical Internship Programme referred to above with a view to strengthening the protection of foreign technical interns. The Government is also requested to provide information on the measures that it continues to take to identify the abuses, through appropriate inspections and monitoring, supplying statistics on the numbers of cases of prosecutions and convictions, and indicating the penalties imposed on perpetrators.

III. Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25. Trafficking in persons. Referring to its earlier comments, the Committee notes with interest the comprehensive information regarding measures taken by the Government in its ongoing efforts to combat trafficking in persons provided in its report received on 30 September 2010. The Committee also notes the 2009 Action Plan to combat trafficking in persons communicated by the Government on 6 October 2010, which is aimed at eliminating the crime of trafficking in persons. The 2009 Action Plan, like the previous 2004 Action Plan, aims to prevent trafficking by achieving close cooperation among all government ministries and agencies concerned and enhancing cooperation with international organizations and NGOs. The Government indicates that the 2009 Action Plan intends to raise the awareness of the general public to understand the definition of trafficking in persons, the fact that victims of trafficking include but are not limited to non-Japanese women and children, and that the crime should be tackled by the society as a whole. The Committee also notes the comments received from the Japanese Trade Union Confederation (JTUC–RENGO) concerning anti-trafficking measures, communicated by the Government with its report, in which JTUC–RENGO calls, inter alia, for the implementation of a multifaceted support system in accordance with the 2008 recommendations of the United Nations Human Rights Committee, encompassing a broad range of measures, including procedures aimed at ensuring the protection of victims' human rights, as well as assistance in repatriation and resettlement in their home countries.

The Committee notes the information supplied by the Government concerning various measures taken in the areas of prevention and awareness raising, protection of victims, law enforcement, prosecution of offenders, and cooperation with foreign governments and international organizations. It notes, in particular, the following information:

- information about the work of the Inter-Ministerial Liaison Committee (Task Force) in reviewing the implementation of the National Action Plan and elaborating of the draft 2009 Action Plan, which was adopted at the ministerial meeting on 22 December 2009;
- information on preventive measures, such as the reinforcement of immigration control measures and measures to raise public awareness of trafficking in persons;
- information on measures relating to the protection of victims of trafficking, including the functioning of the Women's Consulting Offices (which is a network of multi-service public shelters providing various forms of assistance to the victims), improvement in the status of residence of the victims and assistance for the victims' repatriation;
- statistical information concerning the numbers of trafficking prosecutions; and
- information on international cooperation with the Governments of the countries concerned, on cooperation between the Japanese National Police Agency and law enforcement agencies of other countries in the investigation and prosecution of traffickers, and on the contribution of the Japanese Government to the efforts made by the international organizations to prevent, suppress and punish human trafficking and to protect the victims.

The Committee hopes that the Government will continue to provide, in its future reports, information concerning the implementation of various measures provided for in the 2009 Action Plan to prevent, suppress and combat trafficking in persons, including, in particular, information on the application of criminal sanctions to the perpetrators and supplying available statistics.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1964)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Compulsory labour in connection with the conservation of natural resources. For many years, the Committee has been referring to sections 13–18 of the Chief's Authority Act (Cap. 128), as amended by Act No. 10 of 1997, according to which able-bodied male persons between 18 and 50 years of age may be required to perform any work or service in connection with the conservation of natural resources for up to 60 days in any year. The Committee has noted the Government's repeated indication that the Chief's Authority Act will be replaced by the Administrative Authority Act. The Government also states in its latest report that sections 13–18 of the Chief's Authority Act referred to above have never been enforced and undertakes to supply a copy of the new Act, as soon as it is adopted.

The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Administrative Authority Act, which is intended to replace the Chief's Authority Act, will soon be adopted and that the legislation will be brought into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice. It asks the Government to supply a copy of the Administrative Authority Act, as soon as it is adopted.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1964)

The Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption of the Merchant Shipping Act, 2009, which has repealed the Merchant Shipping Act of 1967, which contained provisions punishing various breaches of discipline by seafarers with imprisonment (involving compulsory labour), even in circumstances where the ship or the life or health of persons were not endangered, as well as provisions, under which deserting seafarers could be forcibly returned on board ship to perform their duties.

The Committee also notes with satisfaction the adoption of the Labour Relations Act, 2007, which has repealed the Trade Disputes Act (Cap. 234), under which sentences of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) could be imposed for participating in strikes.

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for expressing political views. For many years, the Committee has been referring to certain provisions of the Penal Code, the Public Order Act and the Prohibited Publications Order, 1968, under which sentences of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) may be imposed as a punishment for participating in certain meetings and gatherings, for the display of emblems or the distribution of publications signifying association with a political object or political organization. The Committee has noted the Government's repeated statement in its reports that it is committed to bring the national legislation into conformity with the Convention. It notes from the Government's latest report that the issues raised by the Committee have been brought to the attention of the relevant authorities. The Committee trusts that the provisions of the Penal Code, the Public Order Act and the Prohibited Publications Order referred to above will be brought into conformity with the Convention and that the Government will soon be in a position to report the progress made in this regard. It also asks the Government to provide information on various points raised in a more detailed request addressed directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 2000)

Article 1(d) of the Convention. Sanctions for participating in strikes. The Committee notes with satisfaction that the Industrial Relations Code (Amendment) Act, 2008, has repealed a provision in section 30 of the Industrial Relations Code, which imposed sanctions of imprisonment (involving compulsory prison labour) against unlawful strikes. The Committee also notes with satisfaction that the same Act has repealed a provision in section 37 of the Industrial Relations Code, which imposed similar sanctions in cases where a strike might "expose valuable property to the risk of destruction, loss or serious injury".

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1968)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Freedom of domestic workers to terminate employment. The Committee notes the ILO technical assistance mission in February 2010, during which a tripartite workshop was held on report writing on international labour standards, and issues relating to the application of the Conventions were discussed, including the situation of foreign domestic workers. Referring to its earlier comments, in which the Committee expressed concern about the situation of domestic workers, the Committee notes that the new Labour Code (Law No. 6, 2010) excludes domestic workers from its scope (section 5). It notes, however, that the same section of the new Labour Code authorizes the competent minister to issue a decision concerning this category of workers specifying the rules governing the relationship between domestic workers and their employers. The Committee also notes Order No. 568 of 29 May 2005, issued by the Council of Ministers, supplied by the Government with its report, which provides for the establishment of a permanent committee for the regulation of the situation of migrant workers in the private sector, including domestic workers, as well as the information concerning the activities of this permanent committee. The Committee further notes sample copies of employment contracts concluded with domestic workers, in accordance with the model contract issued by the Ministry of Interior, communicated by the Government. Regarding the right of domestic workers to terminate employment, the Committee notes that, according to section 1 of Part V of the model contract, domestic workers can terminate employment by notifying their employer two months before the end of the contract. The Government also states, as regards a possibility for domestic workers to have recourse to courts, that these workers may initiate legal proceedings without any restrictions.

While noting this information, the Committee trusts that the Ministerial Decision specifying the rules governing the relationship between domestic workers and their employers, to which reference is made in the new Labour Code, will be issued in the near future, and that it will provide adequate protection for domestic workers as regards their freedom to terminate employment. The Committee asks the Government to communicate a copy of the Ministerial Decision, as soon as it is promulgated.

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25. Trafficking in persons. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to indicate measures taken or envisaged, both in legislation and in practice, to prevent, suppress and punish trafficking in persons, including victim protection measures, as well as any intention to introduce penal provisions aiming specifically at the punishment of trafficking in persons. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that a bill on combating trafficking in persons and the smuggling of migrants has been submitted to the Council of Ministers for its adoption before its referral to the Majlis El Ummah (Parliament). The Government indicates that the bill includes a definition of trafficking in persons and the provisions imposing penalties on perpetrators, as well as the provisions relating to the protection of victims of human trafficking. Furthermore, the bill provides for the setting up of a national committee for combating human trafficking, which will formulate policies and programmes in this field.

The Committee hopes that the bill on combating trafficking in persons will be passed in the near future and that the Government will provide a copy of the new anti-trafficking law, once it has been adopted. Please provide information on the activities of the national committee for combating human trafficking referred to above, in particular on the relevant policies and programmes, as well as the information on the application in practice of sections 138 and 173 of the Penal Code, to which the Government refers in its report in relation to the punishment of human trafficking.

Article 25. Penal sanctions for the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour. In its earlier comments, the Committee observed that the national legislation does not contain any specific provisions under which the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour is punishable as a penal offence, and invited the Government to take the necessary measures, for example by introducing a new provision to that effect in the legislation. The Government has referred in this regard to various penal provisions (such as sections 49 and 57 of Law No. 31 of 1970 on the amendment of the Penal Code, or section 121 of the Penal Code) prohibiting public officials or employees to force a worker to perform a job for the State or for any public body, as well as to section 173 of the Penal Code, which provides for the imposition of penalties on anyone who threatens another person physically or with damage to his reputation or property with a view to forcing the victim to do something or to refrain from doing something.

The Committee takes note of the Government's view expressed in its report that the above penal provisions are sufficient to hinder a person from exacting labour from another person. The Government indicates, however, that the information on the application of these provisions in practice is not currently available.

The Committee recalls, referring to the explanations in paragraphs 135–140 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour that, in stipulating that the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour shall be punishable as a penal offence, and that States must ensure that the penalties imposed by law are really adequate and strictly enforced, Article 25 provides a repressive component which ultimately plays a preventive role, since effective punishment of perpetrators encourages victims to lodge complaints and has a dissuasive effect. The Committee therefore trusts that the necessary measures will be taken (e.g. on the occasion of the possible future revision of the Penal Code) in order to give full effect to Article 25 of the Convention. Pending the adoption of such measures, the Committee again requests the Government to communicate information on the application of the above penal provisions in practice, supplying copies of the court decisions and indicating the penalties imposed, as soon as such information becomes available.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1961)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Punishment for expressing political views. The Committee previously noted that Legislative Decree No. 65 of 1979, which imposed certain restrictions on the organization of public meetings and gatherings enforceable with penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory prison labour), was declared unconstitutional by the Constitutional Court in 2006. It also noted that a new law concerning public meetings and gatherings was drafted in 2008. While noting the Government's indication that the new law concerning public meetings and gatherings is still in the draft form, the Committee hopes that this law will soon be adopted and that the Government will communicate a copy for the examination by the Committee.

Article 1(c) and (d). Disciplinary measures applicable to seafarers. For many years, the Committee has been referring to certain provisions of Legislative Decree No. 31 of 1980 regarding security, order and discipline on board ship, under which various breaches of discipline (unauthorized absence, repeated disobedience, failure to return to the vessel) committed by common agreement by three persons may be punished by imprisonment (involving compulsory prison labour). The Committee recalls that penalties imposed for violations of labour discipline or punishment for having participated in a strike do not come within the scope of the Convention if the acts endanger the safety of the vessel or the life or health of persons. The Committee notes that sections 11, 12 and 13 of the Legislative Decree do not appear to limit the application of the penalties to such acts.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in the report that no penalties have been imposed under Legislative Decree No. 31 of 1980 and no violations of its provisions have been committed. The Government also undertakes to communicate information on any measures taken with regard to the above Legislative Decree. While noting these indications, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the necessary measures to amend Legislative Decree No. 31 of 1980 will soon be taken, for example by clearly indicating that the imposition of penalties involving compulsory labour is strictly limited to acts endangering the vessel or the life or health of persons. Pending the adoption of such measures, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the application of the Legislative Decree in practice, supplying copies of court decisions and indicating the penalties imposed.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1977)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Vulnerable situation of migrant domestic workers with regard to the illegal exaction of forced labour. Referring to its earlier comments, the Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the National Steering Committee has drafted a Bill on the regulation of the work of domestic workers, which is to be reviewed by the House of Deputies. It also notes with interest the preparation of a Guiding Manual for migrant female domestic workers, as well as the promulgation by the Minister of Labour of Order No. 38/1 of 16 March 2009, relating to the implementation of a consolidated labour contract for domestic workers and Order No. 52/1 of 28 April 2009, extending the coverage of social security to all foreign workers in Lebanon, including domestic workers.

The Government also indicates that a working team has been established by Order No. 8/1 of 20 January 2009, whose task is to monitor the work of employment agencies which bring in migrant domestic workers, to examine requests to establish new agencies for bringing in workers and to investigate the complaints against such employment agencies, as well as complaints filed by domestic workers against employers. In this regard, the Minister of Labour issued Memorandum No. 21/1 of 20 February 2009, which regulates the work of the team, in particular examining and investigating the complaints filed against the employment agencies which bring in female domestic workers. Furthermore, the Minister of Labour promulgated Order No. 13/1 of 22 January 2009, regulating the employment agencies which bring in migrant female domestic workers.

While noting this information, the Committee asks the Government to provide a copy of the Bill on the regulation of the work of domestic workers referred to above, once it has been adopted by the House of Deputies. Please also continue to provide information on the activities of the National Steering Committee and on the various measures taken, both in legislation and in practice, to protect migrant domestic workers with a view to the complete elimination of the exaction of forced labour from this category of workers.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1931)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1(1), 2(1), and 25 of the Convention. Forced labour and captivity practices as a consequence of the armed conflict. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the allegations concerning forced labour and captivity practices which took place in the south-eastern part of the country in connection with armed conflict, where children were allegedly held hostage by adults and used as a source of forced and captive labour. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication in its report that the special investigation committee sent by the Government to investigate the alleged forced labour practices in the south-eastern region recommended that a national committee be established to trace and reunite displaced women and children taken captive during the war and that, in order to enhance the National Reconciliation and Reunification Programmes, "local authorities should be directed to encourage their citizens to report any acts of alleged forced labour, intimidation, harassment, maltreatment for appropriate investigation and corrective measures".

While having noted that the south-eastern part of the country was in a grave humanitarian crisis and an extreme state of poverty and that any reported situations of forced labour exploitation were due to the consequences of the war, the Committee expressed the hope that the Government would encourage joint efforts and cooperation between governmental bodies and non-governmental organizations at all levels with a view to the effective elimination of all forms of compulsory labour, including that of children, and requested the Government to supply full information on measures taken to this end.

The Committee notes the Government's brief indication in its report supplied in May 2008 that a tripartite national committee is being considered to investigate the complaints of forced labour and hostage situation in the south-eastern region, that consultations for this investigation have already begun and the committee is expected to start its work in the near future. The Committee reiterates the firm hope that the Government will provide, in its next report, full information on the activities of the abovementioned tripartite national committee and on the specific action taken to investigate the situation in the South-East as regards the alleged practices of forced labour, as well as on the measures taken to eliminate such practices. The Committee also hopes that the Government will supply information on the results achieved in this regard by the Liberian Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC), which was set up to investigate human rights violations and was empowered to recommend for prosecution the most serious offenders, as well as information on the progress achieved in the establishment of an Independent National Human Rights Commission and drawing up of a national human rights action plan.

Recalling also that, under Article 25 of the Convention, the illegal exaction of forced labour shall be punishable as a penal offence and it shall be an obligation of the State to ensure that the penalties imposed are really adequate and are strictly enforced, the Committee hopes that the necessary action to give effect to this Article will be taken in the near future, by imposing penal sanctions on persons convicted of having exacted forced labour, and that the Government will provide, in its next report, information on any legal proceedings which have been instituted for that purpose and on any penalties imposed.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1(a), (c) and (d) of the Convention. Sanctions for expressing political views, for breaches of labour discipline or participation in strikes. Since many years, the Committee has been referring to various provisions of the Publications Act of 1972, under which persons expressing certain political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system may be punished with penalties of imprisonment (involving, under section 24(1) of the Penal Code, an obligation to perform labour). The Committee also referred to sections 237 and 238 of the Penal Code, under which penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) may be imposed on public servants or employees of public institutions as a punishment for breaches of labour discipline or for participation in strikes, even in services the interruption of which would not endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the abovementioned Publications Act No. 76 of 1972 will be amended and the Committee's comments have been taken into account in the draft new Act under consideration. The Government also indicates that the draft amended Act has been submitted to the 2008 session of the Basic People's Congresses. The Committee notes, however, that no new information has been supplied as regards the amendment of sections 237 and 238 of the Penal Code referred to above, though the Government has repeatedly expressed its intention to amend them in its earlier reports.

The Committee trusts that Publications Act No. 76 of 1972, as well as the provisions of the Penal Code referred to above, will be amended in the near future, in order to bring legislation into conformity with the Convention, so as to ensure that no penalties involving compulsory labour may be imposed as a punishment on persons who have expressed certain political or ideological opinions or who have committed breaches of labour discipline or participated in strikes. The Committee asks the Government to supply copies of the amended texts, as soon as they are adopted.

Supply of legislation. The Committee asks the Government once again to provide copies of the legislative texts governing the establishment, functioning and dissolution of associations and political parties and hopes that the Government will not fail to supply such copies with its next report.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1957)

Article 2(2)(d) of the Convention. Requisitioning of persons. For many years the Committee has been emphasizing the need to amend or repeal several legislative texts which authorize the requisitioning of persons and of goods in order to satisfy national needs (the Dahirs of 10 August 1915 and 25 March 1918, as retained in the Dahir of 13 September 1938 and reintroduced by Decree No. 2-63-436 of 6 November 1963). These provisions go beyond what is authorized under Article 2(2)(d) of the Convention, under the terms of which requisitioning, and consequently the imposition of work, should be confined to situations endangering the existence or well-being of the whole or part of the population.

In view of the consensus obtained with the social partners to amend the provisions of the legislation and the fact that in practice the public authorities do not appear to make use of these provisions for the requisitioning of persons, the Committee expressed the hope in its previous observation that contacts between the Department of Labour and the Ministry of the Interior would rapidly result in the Dahir of 1938 being brought into conformity with the Convention. Noting with regret that the Government has not provided any information on the progress achieved with a view to the amendment of the Dahir of 1938, the Committee trusts that the Government will not fail to take all the necessary measures to ensure that the national legislation is in conformity with the Convention and with the indicated practice.

Article 25. Effective and strictly applied penal sanctions. In its previous comments, the Committee expressed its reservations concerning the dissuasive nature of the penalties set out in section 12 of the Labour Code against persons requisitioning employees to perform forced labour or to work against their will (a fine of between 25,000 and 30,000 dirhams and, in the event of repeated offences, a fine of double that amount and imprisonment for between six days and three months, or one of these two penalties). The Committee emphasized that recourse to forced labour is a serious offence and that the penalties that may be imposed have to be considered effective enough to be of a really dissuasive nature. In its last report, the Government indicates that the penalties set out in section 12 of the Labour Code are deemed sufficiently repressive and that the courts opt for the penalty that appears to be the most appropriate, on the basis of the facts and circumstances of the offence.

The Committee recalls the importance of the penalties set out by the national legislation in cases of the exaction of forced labour being of a penal nature, as required by Article 25 of the Convention, and of them being considered really effective. The Committee has already indicated that a fine or a short prison sentence cannot be considered an effective penalty in view of the gravity of the offence, on the one hand, and the need for the penalties to be of a dissuasive nature, on the other. While noting that the penalties set out in section 12 of the Labour Code correspond to the highest level of penalties established by the Labour Code, the Committee hopes that the Government will be able to re-examine this matter, either in the context of a revision of the Labour Code or by criminalizing forced labour in the Penal Code and making persons who have recourse to forced labour liable to the penalties applicable for criminal offences.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1955)

Follow-up to the recommendations made by the Commission of Inquiry (complaint made under article 26 of the Constitution of the ILO)

Historical background

In its earlier comments, the Committee has discussed in detail the history of this extremely serious case, which has involved the Government's gross, long-standing and persistent non-observance of the Convention, as well as the failure by the Government to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, appointed by the Governing Body in March 1997 under article 26 of the Constitution. The continued failure by the Government to comply with these recommendations and the observations of the Committee of Experts, as well as other matters arising from the discussion in the other bodies of the ILO, led to the unprecedented exercise of article 33 of the Constitution by the Governing Body at its 277th Session in March 2000, followed by the adoption of a resolution by the Conference at its June 2000 session.

The Committee recalls that the Commission of Inquiry, in its conclusions on the case, pointed out that the Convention was violated in national law and in practice in a widespread and systematic manner. In its recommendations (paragraph 539(a) of the report of the Commission of Inquiry of 2 July 1998), the Commission urged the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure:

- (1) that the relevant legislative texts, in particular the Village Act and the Towns Act, be brought into line with the Convention;
- (2) that in actual practice, no more forced or compulsory labour be imposed by the authorities, in particular the military; and
- (3) that the penalties which may be imposed under section 374 of the Penal Code for the exaction of forced or compulsory labour be strictly enforced, which required thorough investigation, prosecution and adequate punishment of those found guilty.

The Commission of Inquiry emphasized that, besides amending the legislation, concrete action needed to be taken immediately to bring an end to the exaction of forced labour in practice, to be accomplished through public acts of the Executive promulgated and made known to all levels of the military and to the whole population. In its earlier comments, the Committee of Experts has identified four areas in which "concrete action" should be taken by the Government to fulfil the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. In particular, the Committee indicated the following measures:

- issuing specific and concrete instructions to the civilian and military authorities;
- ensuring that the prohibition of forced labour is given wide publicity;
- providing for the budgeting of adequate means for the replacement of forced or unpaid labour; and
- ensuring the enforcement of the prohibition of forced labour.

Developments since the Committee's previous observation

There have been a number of discussions and conclusions by ILO bodies, as well as further documentation received by the ILO, which has been considered by the Committee. In particular, the Committee notes the following information:

- the report of the ILO Liaison Officer submitted to the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards during the 99th Session of the International Labour Conference in June 2010, as well as the discussions and conclusions of that Committee (ILC, 99th Session, Provisional Record No. 16, Part Three(A) and document D.5(D));
- the documents submitted to the Governing Body at its 307th and 309th Sessions (March and November 2010), as well as the discussions and conclusions of the Governing Body during those sessions;
- the communication made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) received in August 2010 together with the detailed appendices of more than 1,400 pages;
- the communication made by the Federation of Trade Unions Kawthoolei (FTUK) received in September 2010 with appendices; and
- the reports of the Government of Myanmar received on 16 December 2009, 4 January, 4 February, 12 and 18 March, 6 April, 19 May, 19 August, 8 September and 6 October 2010.

The Supplementary Understanding of 26 February 2007 – Extension of the complaints mechanism

In its earlier comments, the Committee discussed the significance of the Supplementary Understanding (SU) of 26 February 2007 between the Government and the ILO, which supplemented the earlier Understanding of 19 March 2002 concerning the appointment of an ILO Liaison Officer in Myanmar. As the Committee previously noted, the SU sets out a complaints mechanism, which has as its object "to formally offer the possibility to victims of forced labour to channel their complaints through the services of the Liaison Officer to the competent authorities with a view to seeking remedies available under the relevant legislation and in accordance with the Convention". The Committee notes that the trial period of the SU was extended for the third time, on 19 January 2010, for a further 12 months from 26 February 2010 until 25 February 2011 (ILC, 99th Session, Provisional Record No. 16, Part Three, document D.5(F)). The Committee further discusses the information on the functioning of the SU below, in the context of its comments on the other documentation, discussions and conclusions regarding this case.

Discussion and conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards

The Committee on the Application of Standards once again discussed this case in a special sitting during the 99th Session of the Conference in June 2010. The Conference Committee acknowledged some limited steps on the part of the Government, such as: the further extension of the SU for another year; the agreement for publication and distribution of an informative brochure on forced labour; certain activities concerning awareness raising of the complaints mechanism established by the SU, including newspaper articles in the national language; and certain improvements in dealing with under-age recruitment by the military. The Conference Committee was, however, of the view that those steps remained totally inadequate. It noted that none of the three specific and clear recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry had been implemented and strongly urged the Government to: fully implement without delay these recommendations and, in particular, to take the necessary steps to bring the relevant legislative texts into line with the Convention; to ensure the total elimination of the full range of forced labour practices, including the recruitment of children into the armed forces and human trafficking for forced labour that are still persistent and widespread; to strictly ensure that perpetrators of forced labour, whether civil or military, are prosecuted and punished under the Penal Code; to release immediately complainants and other persons associated with the use of the complaints mechanism who are currently detained, etc. The Conference Committee also called for strengthening of the capacity available to the ILO Liaison Officer to assist the Government in addressing all of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, and to ensure the effectiveness of the operation of the complaints mechanism.

Discussions in the Governing Body

The Governing Body continued its discussions of this case during its 307th and 309th Sessions in March and November 2010 (GB.307/6, GB.309/6). The Committee notes that, following the discussion in November 2010, the Governing Body reconfirmed all of its previous conclusions and those of the International Labour Conference and called upon the Government and the Office to work proactively towards their realization. In the light of the commitment made by the Permanent Representative of the Government, the Governing Body called on the new Parliament to proceed without delay to bring legislation into line with the Convention. While noting the increased number of the complaints received under the SU complaints mechanism, the Governing Body considered it essential that the movement towards an environment free from harassment or fear of retribution be sustained, and called upon the Government to cooperate with the Liaison Officer on cases raised at the Officer's own initiative. Notwithstanding the reported progress in increased awareness of both government personnel and the community at large of their rights and responsibilities under the law, further committed action is required to end all forms of forced labour, including under-age recruitment into the military and human trafficking, as well as the strict application of the Penal Code to all perpetrators, in order to bring an end to the impunity. The Governing Body also called for the continuation and intensification of awareness-raising activities undertaken jointly and severally by the Government and the ILO Liaison Officer encompassing government personnel, the military and civil society. Finally, the Governing Body welcomed the release of Daw Aung San Suu Kyi and urged that other persons still in detention, including labour activists and persons associated with the submission of complaints under the SU, would be similarly given their liberty as soon as possible.

Communication received from workers' organizations

The Committee notes the comments made by the ITUC in its communication received in August 2010. Appended to this communication were 51 documents, amounting to more than 1,400 pages, containing extensive and detailed documentation referring to the persistence of widespread forced labour practices by civil and military authorities in almost all of the country's states and divisions. In many cases, the documentation refers to specific dates, locations, circumstances, specific civil bodies, military units and individual officials. Specific incidents referred to in the ITUC documentation involve allegations of a wide variety of types of work and services requisitioned by authorities, including work directly related to the military (portering, construction and forced recruitment of children), as well as work of a more general nature, including work in agriculture, construction and maintenance of roads and other infrastructure work. The ITUC documentation includes, inter alia, reports submitted to it by the Federation of Trade Unions of Burma (FTUB) and its affiliate, the FTUK, which contain allegations that victims of forced labour who were encouraged by these organizations to report to the ILO, have been prosecuted for it and subsequently jailed. The ITUC documentation also includes translated copies of numerous written orders ("Order documents" or "Order letters") apparently from military and other authorities to village authorities in Karen State, Chin State and some other states and divisions, containing a range of demands, entailing in most cases a requisition for compulsory (and uncompensated) labour. Thus, the report submitted by the FTUK, which was also directly communicated to the ILO in a communication received in September 2010 referred to above, includes translated copies of 94 Order documents issued by military authorities to village heads in Karen State between January 2009 and June 2010. The tasks and services demanded by these documents involved, inter alia, portering for the military, bridge repair, collection of raw materials, production and delivery of thatch shingles and bamboo poles, attendance at meetings, provision of money, food and other supplies, provision of information on individuals and households, etc. The report states that the above orders illustrate the persistent exaction of forced labour by the military in the rural Karen State, which significantly contributes to poverty, livelihoods vulnerability, food insecurity and displacement of large numbers of villagers. Copies of the above communications by the ITUC and the FTUK with annexes were transmitted to the Government, in September 2010, for such comments as it may wish to make on the matters raised therein.

The Government's reports

The Committee notes the Government's reports, referred to in paragraph 4 above, which include replies to the Committee's previous observation. It notes, in particular, the Government's indications concerning the Government's continued cooperation with the various functions of the ILO Liaison Officer, including monitoring and investigating the forced labour situation and the operation of the SU complaints mechanism, as well as the Government's efforts in the field of the awareness-raising and training activities on forced labour, including the joint ILO–Ministry of Labour (MOL) presentation made at the Deputy Township Judges' training course in Yangon in March 2010 and the distribution of booklets on the SU and informative, simply worded brochures on forced labour. The Committee also notes the Government's indications concerning measures taken to prevent recruitment of under-age children and to release newly recruited under-age soldiers from September 2009 up to August 2010. As regards the amendment of the legislation, the Government indicates that the Ministry of Home Affairs has been coordinating with the concerned departments in reviewing the Village Act and Towns Act. However, no action has been taken or contemplated to amend section 359 of the Constitution. The Committee also notes that the Government has not yet supplied its comments on the numerous specific allegations contained in the communications from the ITUC and the FTUK referred to above, as well as in the communication by the ITUC received in September 2009. The Committee urges the Government to respond in detail in its next report to the numerous specific allegations of continued, widespread imposition of forced or compulsory labour by military and civil authorities throughout the country, which are documented in the above communications from the ITUC and the FTUK, making particular reference to the "Order documents", which constitute conclusive evidence of the systematic imposition of forced labour by the military.

Assessment of the situation

Assessment of the information available on the situation of forced labour in Myanmar in 2010 and in relation to the implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and compliance with the Convention by the Government will be discussed in three parts, dealing with: (i) amendment of legislation; (ii) measures to stop the exaction of forced or compulsory labour in practice; and (iii) enforcement of penalties prescribed under the Penal Code and other relevant provisions of law.

(i) Amendment of legislation

The Committee previously noted the Government's statement in its report received on 27 August 2009 that the Village Act and the Towns Act "have been put into dormant [sic] effectively and legally" by Order No. 1/99 (Order directing not to exercise powers under certain provisions of the Towns Act 1907, and the Village Act 1907) as supplemented by the Order of 27 October 2000. The Committee observed that the latter orders had yet to be given bona fide effect and do not dispense with the separate need to eliminate the legislative basis for the exaction of forced labour. Noting the Government's indication in its report received on 19 August 2010, that the Ministry of Home Affairs has been coordinating with the concerned departments in reviewing these Acts, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the long overdue steps to amend or repeal them will soon be taken and that legislation will be brought into conformity with the Convention. The Committee asks the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the progress made in this regard.

In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to section 359 of the Constitution (Chapter VIII – Citizenship, fundamental rights and duties of citizens), which excepts from the prohibition of forced labour "duties assigned by the Union in accordance with the law in the interest of the public". The Committee observed that the exception encompasses permissible forms of forced labour that exceed the scope of the specifically defined exceptions in Article 2(2) of the Convention and could be interpreted in such a way as to allow a generalized exaction of forced labour from the population. The Committee notes with regret the Government's statement in its report received on 19 August 2010, that "it is completely impossible to amend the Constitution ... as it was ratified by the referendum held in May 2008 with 92.48 per cent affirmative votes". The Committee urges the Government once again to take the necessary measures with a view to amending section 359 of Chapter VIII of the Constitution, in order to bring it into conformity with the Convention.

(ii) Measures to stop the exaction of forced or compulsory labour in practice

Information available on current practice. In paragraph 8 of this observation, the Committee referred in detail to the communications received from the ITUC and the FTUK, which contain well-documented allegations that forced and compulsory labour continued to be exacted from local villagers in 2010 by military and civil authorities in almost all of the country's states and divisions. The information in the numerous appendices refers to specific dates, locations and circumstances of the occurrences, as well as to specific civil bodies, military units and individual officials responsible for them. According to these reports, forced labour has been requisitioned both by military personnel and civil authorities, and has taken a wide variety of forms and involved a variety of tasks.

The Committee notes from the report of the ILO Liaison Officer to the Conference Committee in June 2010 (ILC, 99th Session, Provisional Record No. 16, Part Three, document D.5(C)) that, while the SU complaints mechanism continues to function and the awareness-raising activities continue to take place, complaints alleging the use of forced labour by both military and civil authorities continue to be received (paragraphs 5 and 6). The ILO Liaison Officer also refers to numerous requests to the authorities to release identified victims of under-age military recruitment and states that the work related to under-age recruitment under the SU supports the activity of the UN Country Task Force on Monitoring and Reporting on Children Affected by Armed Conflict under Security Council Resolution 1612 (paragraphs 8 and 12). According to the report, a number of complaints of human trafficking for forced labour have been received; three such cases have been referred to the ILO anti-trafficking projects based outside the country and have resulted in the release of 56 persons from a forced labour situation in neighbouring countries. The ILO Liaison Officer further states that “non-verifiable available evidence does suggest that the use of forced labour by the civilian authorities has been reduced at least in some locations and parts of the country”, which is most likely due to the extensive awareness-raising activities and the heightened awareness of local authority personnel (paragraphs 7 and 11). However, according to the Governing Body document submitted to its 307th Session in March 2010, “Whilst there are indications from some parts of the country that the actual incidence of forced labour imposed by civilian authorities has diminished to some extent, this on its own would not account for the reduction in complaints. The use of forced labour, particularly by the military, remains an issue throughout the country” (GB.307/6, paragraph 5).

Issuing specific and concrete instructions to the civilian and military authorities. In its earlier comments, the Committee emphasized that specific, effectively conveyed instructions to civil and military authorities, and to the population at large, are required which identify each and every field of forced labour, and which explain concretely for each field the means and manner by which the tasks or services involved are to be carried out without recourse to forced labour. The Committee previously noted the Government’s general statement in its report received on 1 June 2009 that “the various levels of administrative authority are well aware of the orders and instructions related to forced labour prohibition issued by the higher levels”. However, the Committee notes that no new information has been provided by the Government in its subsequent reports on this important issue. Given the continued dearth of information regarding this issue, the Committee remains unable to ascertain that clear instructions have been effectively conveyed to all civil authorities and military units, and that bona fide effect has been given to such instructions. It reiterates the need for concrete instructions to be issued to all levels of the military and to the whole population, which identify all fields and practices of forced labour and provide concrete guidance as to the means and manner by which tasks or services in each field are to be carried out, and for steps taken to ensure that such instructions are fully publicized and effectively supervised. Considering that measures to issue instructions to civilian and military authorities on the prohibitions of forced and compulsory labour are vital and need to be intensified, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will provide, in its next report, information on the measures taken in this regard, including translated copies of the instructions which have been issued reconfirming the prohibition of forced labour.

Ensuring that the prohibition of forced labour is given wide publicity. In relation to ensuring that the prohibition of forced labour is given wide publicity, the Committee notes from the report of the ILO Liaison Officer referred to above, from the documents submitted to the Governing Body and to the Conference Committee, as well as from the Government’s reports, that a number of awareness-raising activities concerning the forced labour situation, the legal prohibitions of forced labour and existing avenues of recourse for victims were carried out in 2010. These included, inter alia, three joint ILO–MOL awareness-raising seminars at state/division level for civil and military personnel held in Rhakine State, Magway Division and Bago Division; two joint ILO–MOL presentations on the law and practice on forced labour to a refresher training course for township judges and deputy judges; and three training seminars/presentations for members of the armed forces, the police and the prison service on the law and practice concerning under-age recruitment into the military. During the meeting of the ILO mission with the Minister of Labour (January 2010), the Government agreed to the publication of a simply worded brochure, in Myanmar language, explaining the law pertaining to forced labour, including under-age recruitment, and the procedures available to victims for lodging a complaint (GB.307/6, paragraph 9). The Governing Body, while calling for the continuation and intensification of awareness-raising activities during its November 2010 session, called on the Government to continue to actively support the wide distribution of the agreed brochure and its translation into all local languages (GB.309/6, paragraph 4). The Committee reiterates its view that such activities are critical in helping to ensure that the prohibition of forced labour is widely known and applied in practice, and should continue and be expanded.

The Committee notes from the Governing Body document submitted to its 309th Session in November 2010 (GB.309/6), that the number of complaints received under the SU complaints mechanism continued to increase: over the period 1 June to 21 October 2010, 160 complaints have been received, as compared to 65 complaints received during the corresponding period in 2009 and 25 for the same period in 2008 (paragraph 18). As at 21 October 2010, a total of 503 complaints have been received under the SU mechanism; 288 cases (assessed to be within the ILO mandate) have been submitted to the Government Working Group for investigation, of which 132 have been resolved with varying degrees of satisfaction; 127 forced and/or under-age recruits have been released/discharged from the military in association with complaints under the SU mechanism (paragraphs 14 and 15). The Committee reiterates its view that the complaints mechanism under the SU in itself provided an opportunity to the authorities to demonstrate that continued recourse to the practice is illegal and would be punished as a penal offence, as required by the Convention. The Committee therefore hopes that the Government will intensify and expand the scale and scope of its efforts to give wide publicity to and raise public awareness about the prohibition of forced labour, including the use of the SU complaints mechanism as an important modality of awareness raising; that it will undertake awareness-raising activities in a more coherent and systematic way; and that it will provide, in its next report, information on measures taken or contemplated in this regard. The Committee further hopes that the Government will provide information on the impact of awareness-raising activities on the enforcement of criminal penalties against perpetrators of forced labour and on the imposition in actual practice of forced or compulsory labour, particularly by the military.

Making adequate budgetary provisions for the replacement of forced or unpaid labour. In its earlier comments, the Committee observed that budgeting of adequate means for the replacement of forced labour, which tends also to be unpaid, is necessary if recourse to the practice is to end. The Committee recalls in this regard that, in its recommendations, the Commission of Inquiry stated that “action must not be limited to the issue of wage payment; it must ensure that nobody is compelled to work against his or her will. Nonetheless, the budgeting of adequate means to hire free wage labour for the public activities which are today based on forced and unpaid labour is also required”. The Committee has noted the Government’s repeated indication in its reports, including the report received on 19 August 2010, that the budget allotments including the expense of labour costs for all ministries have been allocated to implement their projects. Noting that no other information has been provided by the Government on this important issue, the Committee requests the Government once again to provide, in its next report, detailed and precise information on the measures taken to budget adequate means for the replacement of forced or unpaid labour.

(iii) Ensuring the enforcement of the prohibition of forced labour

The Committee previously noted that section 374 of the Penal Code provides for the punishment, by a term of imprisonment of up to one year, of anyone who unlawfully compels any person to labour against his or her will. It also noted that Order No. 1/99 and its Supplementing Order of 27 October 2000, as well as the series of instructions and letters issued by government authorities in 2000–05 with a view to securing the enforcement of those Orders, provide for persons “responsible” for forced labour, including members of the armed forces, to be referred for prosecution under section 374 of the Penal Code. The Committee notes from the Governing Body document submitted to its 309th Session in November 2010 (GB.309/6) that, in respect of cases concerning forced labour exacted by the military, the ILO has received no information concerning the prosecution of any perpetrator under the above provision of the Penal Code. The ILO has been advised that, in four instances, disciplinary action has been taken under military procedures in response to complaints submitted under the SU mechanism, and that in some instances the solution to the complaint has resulted in the issuance of orders requiring behavioural change (paragraph 11). As regards cases concerning forced labour exacted by civilian authorities, prosecution of perpetrators under the Penal Code in response to complaints submitted has been reported only in respect of Case No. 1, which has been already noted by the Committee in its earlier comments and resulted in the prosecution of two civilian officials, who were punished with penalties of imprisonment. In other instances, the solution has involved administrative penalties, including dismissal or transfer, with the majority of cases being resolved by addressing the situation of the complainants without punitive action being taken against the perpetrators (paragraph 12). As regards cases of forced and/or under-age recruitment, a punitive and disciplinary process has increasingly been applied and military perpetrators have been referred to summary trial under military regulations, which resulted in imprisonment in three instances; other penalties which appear to be regularly administered included the loss of seniority, pensionable rights or several days’ pay, as well as the issuance of various levels of formal reprimand (paragraph 13).

The Committee notes with regret that no new information has been provided by the Government in its 2010 reports about any prosecutions against perpetrators of forced labour being pursued under section 374 of the Penal Code. The Committee points out once again that the illegal exaction of forced labour must be punished as a penal offence, rather than treated as an administrative issue, and expresses the firm hope that appropriate measures will be taken in the near future in order to ensure that the penalties which may be imposed under section 374 of the Penal Code for the exaction of forced or compulsory labour are strictly enforced, in conformity with Article 25 of the Convention. It asks the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the progress made in this regard.

Concluding remarks

The Committee fully endorses the conclusions concerning Myanmar made by the Conference Committee and the Governing Body, as well as the general evaluation of the forced labour situation by the ILO Liaison Officer. The Committee observes that, in spite of the efforts made, particularly in the field of awareness raising, cooperation in the functioning of the SU complaints mechanism and in the release of under-age recruits from the military, the Government has not yet implemented the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry: it has failed to amend or repeal the Towns Act and the Village Act; it has failed to ensure that, in actual practice, forced labour is no longer imposed by the authorities, in particular by the military; and it has failed to ensure that penalties for the exaction of forced labour under the Penal Code have been strictly enforced against civil and military authorities. The Committee continues to believe that the only way that genuine and lasting progress in the elimination of forced labour can be made is for the Myanmar authorities to demonstrate unambiguously their commitment to achieving that goal. The Committee urges the Government once again to demonstrate its commitment to rectify the violations of the Convention identified by the Commission of Inquiry, by implementing the concrete practical requests addressed by the Committee to the Government, and that all the long-overdue steps will be taken to achieve compliance with the Convention, both in law and in practice, so that the most serious and long-standing problem of forced labour will be finally resolved.

Niger

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1961)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Slavery and slave-like practices. In its previous comments, the Committee examined the matter of slavery in Niger which exists within certain communities where the status of slave continues to be transmitted by birth to persons from certain ethnic groups. The relations between master and slave are based on direct exploitation: slaves are obliged to work for their masters without remuneration, largely as shepherds, agricultural workers or domestic employees. The Committee noted that the Government did not deny that slavery still existed in certain areas of its territory but indicated that it had taken measures to combat these practices. Among the measures taken by the Government, the Committee noted:

- The adoption of Act No. 2003-025 of 13 June 2003 which amended the Penal Code by introducing sections 270-1 to 270-5. These provisions define slavery, describe the elements that constitute the crime of slavery and the various slavery offences, and lay down the penalties applicable. They also authorize associations established for the purpose of combating slavery or similar practices to sue for damages.
- The issue of circulars requesting the Minister of the Interior to meet with administrative heads, and religious and traditional chiefs to draw their attention to the pressing need to comply with the law and to put an end to all forms of slave-like practices.
- The establishment in August 2006 of the National Committee to Combat Forced Labour and Discrimination to prepare a national action plan in this field on the basis of an in-depth diagnostic study. The plan was finalized in October 2007 and is due to be submitted to the Government for adoption.

The Committee notes with regret that, in its latest report received in December 2009, the Government provides no information on the measures taken to combat slavery and its vestiges, the adoption of the national action plan or the status of the study on the vestiges of forced labour. The Government only states that “the only action brought before the courts involved investigations carried out by the families of future spouses before their engagement or the refusal of a master to allow his servant to marry”. All these cases were considered to be defamation. Furthermore, the Government indicates that the difficulties in implementing sections 270-1 to 270-5 of the Penal Code arise from the fact that “so-called slaves or descendants of slaves make no complaints about their situation or fate. On the contrary, they are pleased that the so-called master or nobleman provides them with all the care and security that they need in return for services rendered”.

The Committee expresses deep concern at the lack of concrete information provided by the Government. It notes that during the period covered by the report, it became aware of the publication, in July 2008, of a study carried out by the National Committee on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (CNDHFF) on the issue of forced labour, child labour and all other forms of slave-like practices. According to this study, “slavery as defined by the international instruments does not exist in Niger but the survival of certain degrading cultural practices means that some individuals do not manage to express themselves fully”. Furthermore, the study concludes that it appears that forced labour as defined by Convention No. 29 does not exist across the entire national territory and that information and communication meetings are necessary to ensure understanding of the definition, characteristics and texts which punish forced labour.

The Committee notes, however, that on 27 October 2008, the Court of Justice of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) recognized, in a case concerning the sale by a tribal leader of a young girl of 12 years of age to be a domestic worker and concubine (the “wahiya” practice or fifth spouse) that this young girl “has been a victim of slavery and that the Republic of Niger is responsible as a result of the failure of its administrative and judicial authorities to take action against that practice”. The Court found that the Republic of Niger had not sufficiently protected the rights of the claimant against the practice of slavery and ordered the payment of a fixed allowance to the victim. The Committee also notes that, in its concluding observations, the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC) expressed deep concern that Niger had not provided information in its report on caste-based slavery practices while those practices exist throughout the country and that the perpetrators of these practices are not prosecuted or punished. The CRC expressed particular concern at the absence of services to free children and adult victims of traditional slavery practices and at the little efforts to educate the public about harmful slavery practices in general (CRC/C/NER/CO/2 of 18 June 2009).

Finally, the Committee notes the agreement between the National Statistics Institute and the International Labour Office, with the collaboration of the National Committee to Combat Forced Labour and Discrimination, on the preparation of a study which gives an account of the forms of forced labour found in Niger and provides estimated statistics at the national level. The results of this study should be validated by the end of 2010.

Taking into account the above information, the Committee hopes that, in its next report, the Government will be in a position to report on the measures taken towards the adoption of a national action plan on combating all forms of forced labour, in particular slavery. The Committee hopes that the national action plan will provide for measures to publicize the provisions of the Penal Code criminalizing slavery, as well as measures to raise the awareness of the population and of the key actors involved in combating slavery, particularly religious and traditional chiefs, police officers and magistrates. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the action taken by the National Committee to Combat Forced Labour and Discrimination. Finally, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the conclusions of the statistical survey carried out by the National Statistics Institute and the Office, including the follow-up decisions taken.

Finally, the Committee recalls that, in accordance with Article 25 of the Convention, the Government shall ensure that the penalties imposed by law are really adequate and are strictly enforced. It stresses that it is essential that the victims are actually in a position to go to the police and judicial authorities to assert their rights so that the perpetrators of slavery offences or the crime of slavery, as provided for in the Penal Code, are prosecuted and, when appropriate, sentenced. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to indicate whether there have been any court decisions based on sections 270-1 to 270-5 of the Penal Code and, if so, to provide a copy of them.

Nigeria

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for expressing political views. 1. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the Public Order Act, Cap. 382, Laws of the Federation of Nigeria, 1990, which contains provisions imposing certain restrictions on the organization of public assemblies, meetings and processions (sections 1–4), offences being punishable with imprisonment (sections 3 and 4(5)), which involves compulsory prison labour. The Committee recalled that Article 1(a) of the Convention prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labour as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system.

The Committee also refers in this connection to paragraphs 154 and 162 of its General Survey of 2007 on the eradication of forced labour, where it observed that the Convention does not prohibit punishment by penalties involving compulsory labour of persons who use violence, incite to violence or engage in preparatory acts aimed at violence. But sanctions involving compulsory labour fall within the scope of the Convention where they enforce a prohibition of the peaceful expression of views or of opposition to the established political, social or economic system. Since opinions and views opposed to the established system are often expressed at various kinds of meetings and assemblies, restrictions affecting the organization of such meetings and assemblies may give rise to similar problems of the application of the Convention, if such restrictions are enforceable with penalties involving compulsory labour.

While noting the Government's statement in the report that the Public Order Act, Cap. 382, does not impose restrictions on the organization of public assemblies by workers for trade union activities and there is therefore no conviction for violation, the Committee observes, however, that the above Act still imposes restrictions on the freedom of expression enforceable with sanctions involving compulsory labour, which is incompatible with the Convention.

The Committee therefore expresses the firm hope that the necessary measures will be taken in order to bring the provisions of the Public Order Act into conformity with the Convention. While having noted the Government's indication in its previous report that there was no record of the violation of the provisions of the Act, the Committee reiterates its hope that, pending the amendment, the Government will continue to provide information on its application in practice, including information on convictions for violation of its provisions and on penalties imposed.

2. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the Nigerian Press Council (Amendment) Act, 2002, which imposes certain restrictions on journalists' activities enforceable with penalties of imprisonment (section 19(1) and (5)(a)), which involves compulsory prison labour. While having noted the Government's repeated indication in its reports that no conviction has been made under the Act, and referring also to the explanations in point 1 of this observation, the Committee reiterates its hope that measures will be taken to repeal or amend these provisions in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice. Pending the amendment, the Government is requested to continue to provide information on the application of these provisions in practice, indicating, in particular, any convictions under the above Act and penalties imposed.

Article 1(c) and (d). Punishment for breaches of labour discipline and for participation in strikes. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the following provisions enforceable with sanctions of imprisonment (which involves compulsory prison labour):

- section 81(1)(b) and (c) of the Labour Decree, 1974, under which a court may direct fulfilment of a contract of employment and posting of security for the due performance of so much of the contract as remains unperformed, and a person failing to comply with such direction may be committed to prison;
- section 117(b), (c) and (e) of the Merchant Shipping Act, under which seafarers are liable to imprisonment for breaches of labour discipline even in the absence of a danger to the safety of the ship or of persons;
- section 17(2)(a) of the Trade Disputes Act, Cap. 432, of 1990, under which participation in strikes may be punished with imprisonment.

The Committee previously noted the Government's indications that all these provisions were under consideration by the National Labour Advisory Council. It also noted the Government's indication in its 2005 report that the review of the labour laws had been completed and submitted to the federal Government for further action. In its latest report, the Government states that the provisions referred to above have been addressed in the Collective Labour Relations Bill. The Committee expresses the firm hope that all of the legislative provisions referred to above will soon be amended, so as to bring legislation into conformity with the Convention, and that the Government will indicate, in its next report, the progress achieved in this regard.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Pakistan

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes a communication dated 30 July 2010, received from the Pakistan Workers Federation (PWF), which contains comments on the application of the Convention by Pakistan. It notes that this communication was sent to the Government in August 2010 for any comments it might wish to make on the matters raised therein. The Committee hopes that the Government's comments will be supplied in its next report, so as to enable the Committee to examine them at its next session.

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention

A. Debt bondage

Comments from workers' organizations. In its comments made for a number of years, the Committee has noted the difficulties in the implementation of the Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Act (BLSA), 1992. The Committee referred in this connection to the comments made by the All Pakistan Federation of Trade Unions (APFTU), the All Pakistan Trade Union Federation (APTUF) and the International Trade Unions Confederation (ITUC). In its latest communication dated 29 August 2008, the ITUC observed that, some 15 years after the adoption of the BLSA and six years after the approval of the National Action Plan (2001), bonded and forced labour was still commonly used in many industries across Pakistan. The ITUC referred in this connection to the rapid assessments commissioned by the Ministry of Labour in collaboration with the ILO, which were carried out in nine sectors (brick kilns, agriculture, carpet industry, mining, glass bangle making, tanneries, construction, domestic work and begging). The ITUC considered that the BLSA had not been properly applied and those who used bonded labour had been able to do it with impunity. The Pakistan Institute for Labour Education and Research (PILER) had only been able to document the release of some 8,530 people between 1990 and 2005; of these, 5,166 were released through judicial intervention, in combination with non-governmental organizations and local state officials, only 563 were released solely through state intervention. According to the ITUC views, the vigilance committees set up under the BLSA had not performed their functions of identifying and releasing bonded labourers and had not been restructured as envisaged in the National Action Plan. The lack of adequate labour inspection machinery was another key reason why bonded labourers were not being identified and released.

Implementation of National Policy and Plan of Action for the Abolition of Bonded Labour. In its earlier comments, the Committee noted a number of initiatives undertaken by the Government within the framework of its 2001 National Policy and Plan of Action for the Abolition of Bonded Labour and Rehabilitation of Freed Bonded Labourers, including, inter alia, the organization of training workshops for key district government officials, and other concerned stakeholders, to enhance their capacity and enable them to draw up district-level plans to identify bonded labourers and activate the district vigilance committees; the incorporation of the issue of bonded labour into the syllabi of judicial, police and civil service academies, in order to help sensitize judicial, law enforcement and civil service officials to the problem; and conducting of capacity-building seminars. The Committee also noted the Government's indication that, under the BLSA, inspection functions in the area of bonded labour had been assigned to the regular labour inspectorate, as well as to local government heads/officials and police departments. In its latest report, the Government refers to a number of studies undertaken with the technical assistance of the ILO with regard to bonded labour in various sectors in Pakistan.

While having noted the Government's initiatives to combat bonded labour, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will pursue its efforts with vigour in order to ensure the effective implementation of the 2001 National Policy and Plan of Action and will provide detailed information on progress made and practical results achieved, including copies of relevant reports on all of the activities, projects, institutions and mandates referred to in the action plan. The Committee asks the Government to provide, in particular, information on the activities of the National Committee for the Abolition of Bonded Labour and Rehabilitation of Bonded Labourers which had to be established to coordinate the implementation of the plan and to review the implementation of the BLSA, including copies of monitoring/evaluation reports concerning the functioning of the vigilance committees. Please also provide information on the activities of the fund established under the BLSA rules, to which the Government referred in its 2005 report. The Committee also asks the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to assess and address the causes of debt bondage.

Debt bondage: Data-gathering measures to ascertain the current nature and scope of the problem. The Committee previously noted a report entitled "Rapid assessment studies of bonded labour in different sectors in Pakistan", which contained findings and conclusions from a series of rapid assessment studies conducted at the initiative of the Ministry of Labour and the ILO by teams of social scientists and researchers under the auspices of the Bonded Labour Research Forum (BLRF), with a view to exploring the existence and nature of bonded labour in ten sectors (agriculture, construction, carpet weaving, brick making, marine fisheries, mining, glass bangles, tanneries, domestic work, and begging). The project represented the first phase of a larger research programme and was intended to lay the groundwork for detailed sector studies and a national survey to determine the incidence of bonded labour across the country, as foreseen in the Government's National Plan of Action. However, no such national survey has yet been carried out and the Government refers in this connection to the existing difficulties in the identification of bonded labourers.

While noting this indication, the Committee points out once again that accurate data are a vital step in both the development of the most effective systems to combat bonded labour and providing a true base for the assessment of effectiveness of those systems. The Committee therefore expresses the firm hope that the Government, as a follow-up to the preliminary part of the research programme noted above, and in accordance with the mandate of its 2001 National Policy and Plan of Action, will undertake a statistical survey on bonded labour throughout the country, using a valid methodology in cooperation with employers' and workers' organizations and with human rights organizations and institutions, and that it will supply information on the progress achieved in this connection.

B. Trafficking in persons

The Committee previously noted the adoption of the Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance, 2002 (PCHTO). It also noted that, in accordance with the report of the International Organisation for Migration (IOM) entitled "Data and research on human trafficking: A global survey", Pakistan continued to be a major destination country for trafficked women, as well as a major transit country of persons trafficked from Bangladesh to Middle Eastern countries, where women are subject to sexual exploitation. The report emphasized that there was an urgent need to carry out comprehensive national baseline surveys with the aim of developing a South Asian database on trafficking in persons.

The Committee reiterates its hope that the Government will undertake a national baseline survey on trafficking in persons, in cooperation with employers' and workers' organizations, as well as other organizations and institutions concerned, and that it will supply information on the progress achieved in this connection. Please also provide information on the application in practice of the Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance (2002) referred to above, as well as, more generally, on the policies and measures aiming at the effective elimination of trafficking in persons, including copies of the relevant policy documents and available statistics.

C. Restrictions on voluntary termination of employment

The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that an amendment to the Essential Services (Maintenance) Act, 1952, under which government employees who unilaterally terminate their employment without consent of the employer are subject to a term of imprisonment, was to be considered by the tripartite commission on the consolidation, simplification and rationalization of labour laws. As the Government's report contains no new information on this subject, the Committee trusts that the necessary measures will be taken in order to bring the federal and provincial essential services Acts into conformity with the Convention and that the Government will report on the progress achieved in this regard.

Article 25. Penalties for the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour

The Committee notes the Government's indications in the report concerning the number of the trafficking-related complaints registered under the Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance (2002), the number of investigations and the number of convictions obtained during the period 2007–09. It also notes the Government's indication concerning the penalties imposed on perpetrators.

The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide updated information on the enforcement of the 2002 Ordinance, communicating the numbers of trafficking-related complaints registered, court proceedings initiated, convictions obtained and the penalties imposed, including sample copies of the relevant court decisions, indicating the minimum penalties imposed. Recalling also that Article 25 of the Convention provides that the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour shall be punishable by penalties that are really adequate and strictly enforced, the Committee once again requests information on any legal actions taken against employers of bonded labourers under the BLSA, including copies of any court decisions in order to demonstrate the effectiveness of its provisions and to indicate the penalties imposed.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1960)

Article 1(c) and (d) of the Convention. 1. Work imposed as a means of labour discipline and as a punishment for having participated in strikes. For a number of years, the Committee has been commenting on certain provisions of the Pakistan Essential Services (Maintenance) Act, 1952, and corresponding provincial Acts, under which employees are prohibited from leaving their employment without the consent of the employer or from striking, subject to penalties of imprisonment that may involve compulsory labour. The Committee previously noted the comments made under the Convention by the All Pakistan Federation of Trade Unions (APFTU), in which it stated that the provisions of the Essential Services Act apply, inter alia, to workers employed in various public utilities such as WAPDA, Railway, Telecommunication, Karachi Port Trust, Sui Gas, etc., and these workers cannot resign from their service and cannot go on strike. In its comments supplied in 2005, the APFTU reiterated its earlier statement that the Essential Services (Maintenance) Act continues to restrict the right to strike even in non-essential services. This view has been shared by the Pakistan Workers' Federation (PWF) in its communication received in 2008.

The Committee previously noted the Government's repeated statement in its reports that the application of the 1952 Act has been made very restrictive and it is extended only in cases of extreme nature, when peaceful and uninterrupted supply of goods and services to the general public appears to be disturbed. While having noted this indication, the Committee points out once again that all the workers concerned – whether in any employment under the federal and provincial governments and local authorities or in public utilities, including essential services – must remain free to terminate their employment by reasonable notice; otherwise a contractual relationship based on the will of the parties may be changed into service by compulsion of law, which is incompatible with both the present Convention and the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), likewise ratified by Pakistan. The Committee also recalls that, in its comments addressed to the Government under the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), it has observed that no penal sanction should be imposed against a worker for having carried out a peaceful strike, and therefore penalties of imprisonment should not be imposed on any account.

Referring to the explanations provided in paragraph 189 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, the Committee trusts that the Pakistan Essential Services Act and corresponding provincial Acts will be either repealed or amended in the near future, so as to ensure that, in conformity with the Convention, no penal sanction involving compulsory labour can be imposed against workers for peaceful participation in a strike, and that the Government will report the progress achieved in this regard.

2. Penal sanctions applicable to seafarers for various breaches of labour discipline. For many years, the Committee has been referring to the provisions of the legislation concerning merchant shipping (Merchant Shipping Act, 1923, which was repealed and replaced by the Pakistan Merchant Shipping Ordinance, 2001 (No. LII of 2001)), under which penalties involving compulsory labour may be imposed in relation to various breaches of labour discipline by seafarers, and seafarers may be forcibly returned on board ship to perform their duties. It noted, in particular, that under sections 204, 206, 207 and 208 of the Pakistan Merchant Shipping Ordinance, 2001, penalties of imprisonment, which may involve compulsory labour by virtue, inter alia, of section 3(26) of the General Clauses Act, 1897, may be imposed in respect of various breaches of labour discipline, such as absence without leave, wilful disobedience, or combining with the crew in “neglect” of duty, and seafarers may be forcibly conveyed on board ship.

While noting the Government's statement in the report that penalties of imprisonment may only be awarded by a competent court of law after a trial, the Committee refers to the explanations in paragraph 144 of its 2007 General Survey, where it pointed out that, in the great majority of cases, labour imposed on persons as a consequence of a conviction in a court of law will have no relevance to the application of the Convention (such as in the cases of the exaction of labour from common offenders convicted, for example, of robbery, kidnapping, acts of violence or various acts or omissions that have endangered the life or health of others). But if a person has to perform compulsory prison labour because that person holds or has expressed particular political views, has committed a breach of labour discipline or has participated in a strike, the situation is covered by the Convention, which prohibits the use “of any form” of forced or compulsory labour as a means of coercion, education or punishment for violation of labour discipline.

The Committee expresses the firm hope that, after several decades of comments addressed to the Government on this point, the necessary measures will at last be taken to repeal or amend these provisions of the 2001 Merchant Shipping Ordinance which prescribe penalties of imprisonment for breaches of labour discipline (e.g. by limiting their scope to offences committed in circumstances endangering the safety of the ship or the life or health of persons) and to repeal the provisions under which seafarers may be forcibly returned on board ship to perform their duties. The Committee asks the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the progress made in this regard.

Article 1(a). Penalties involving compulsory labour as a punishment for expressing political views. In comments made for many years, the Committee has referred to certain provisions in the Security of Pakistan Act, 1952 (sections 10–13), the Political Parties Act, 1962 (sections 2 and 7) and the West Pakistan Press and Publications Ordinance, 1963, which gave the authorities wide discretionary powers to prohibit the publication of views and to order the dissolution of associations, subject to penalties of imprisonment which may involve compulsory labour.

The Committee previously noted the adoption of the Press, Newspapers, News Agencies and Books Registration Ordinance, 2002, which had repealed the West Pakistan Press and Publications Ordinance, 1963. It noted, in particular, the provisions of sections 5 and 28 of the 2002 Ordinance, under which a person who edits, prints, or publishes a newspaper in contravention of the Ordinance (for instance, without having made a declaration or without having a declaration authenticated by the District Coordination Officer) is liable to penalties of imprisonment (which may involve compulsory labour) for a term of up to six months.

The Committee hopes that the necessary measures will be taken with a view to bringing these provisions of the Press, Newspapers, News Agencies and Books Registration Ordinance, 2002, into conformity with Article 1(a) of the Convention, so that no penalty of imprisonment involving compulsory labour can be imposed as a punishment for expressing political views. Pending the adoption of such measures, the Committee asks the Government to provide information on the application of sections 5 and 28 in practice, indicating the penalties imposed and supplying sample copies of the relevant court decisions. Please also communicate a copy of any rules issued under section 44 of the 2002 Ordinance.

As regards the Security of Pakistan Act, 1952, and the Political Parties Act, 1962, referred to above, the Committee previously noted that the Government's Law and Justice Commission, in response to a Supreme Court ruling, had drafted legislative proposals for certain amendments to be made to the Security of Pakistan Act, 1952, and that proposals to amend other laws, including the Political Parties Act, 1962, were under consideration. Noting that the Government's latest report contains no new information on this subject, the Committee reiterates its hope that the Government's concerns will be taken into account by the Law and Justice Commission and that the necessary measures will soon be taken to bring the abovementioned provisions of the Security of Pakistan Act, 1952, and the Political Parties Act, 1962, into conformity with the Convention. Pending the adoption of such measures, the Committee again requests the Government to provide information on the practical application of these provisions, indicating the number of convictions and supplying sample copies of the relevant court decisions.

Article 1(e). Penalties involving compulsory labour as a means of religious discrimination. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to sections 298B(1) and (2) and 298C of the Penal Code, inserted by the Anti-Islamic Activities of Qadiani Group, Lahori Group and Ahmadis (Prohibition and Punishment) Ordinance, No. XX of 1984, under which any person of these groups who uses Islamic epithets, nomenclature and titles is punishable with penalties of imprisonment (which may involve compulsory labour) for a term of up to three years. The Committee previously noted the Government's repeated statement in its reports that religious discrimination does not exist and is forbidden under the Constitution, which guarantees equal citizenship and fundamental rights to minorities living in the country. The Government also stated that the Penal Code imposes equal obligations on all citizens, whatever their religion, to respect the religious sentiments of others, and an act that impinges upon the religious sentiments of other citizens is punishable under the Penal Code. The Government further indicated that religious rituals referred to in Ordinance No. XX are prohibited only if exercised in public, whereas if they are performed in private without causing provocation to others, they do not fall under the prohibition.

While noting these indications, the Committee points out once again, referring to the explanations provided in paragraphs 154 and 190 of its 2007 General Survey, that the Convention does not prohibit punishment by penalties involving compulsory labour of persons who use violence, incite to violence or engage in preparatory acts aimed at violence. But where punishment involving compulsory labour is aimed at the peaceful expression of religious views, or where such punishment (for whatever offence) is meted out more severely, or even exclusively, to certain groups defined in social or religious terms, this falls within the scope of the Convention. The Committee reiterates the firm hope that the necessary measures will be taken in relation to sections 298B and 298C of the Penal Code, so as to ensure the observance of the Convention. Pending the adoption of such measures, the Committee again requests the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the application of these provisions in practice, including sample copies of the court decisions and indicating the penalties imposed.

Papua New Guinea

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1976)

Article 1(c) and (d) of the Convention. Penal sanctions applicable to seafarers for various breaches of labour discipline. In comments it has been making since 1978, the Committee has been referring to certain provisions of the Seamen (Foreign) Act, 1952, under which a seafarer belonging to a foreign ship who deserts or commits certain other disciplinary offences is liable to imprisonment (which involves an obligation to perform labour) (section 2(1) and (3)–(5)). The Committee has been also referring to section 1 of the same Act and section 161 of the revised Merchant Shipping Act (Chapter 242) (consolidated to No. 67 of 1996), which stipulate that foreign seafarers deserting their ship may be forcibly returned on board ship.

As the Committee repeatedly pointed out, referring to the explanations in paragraph 179 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, sanctions of imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour) would only be compatible with the Convention where they are clearly limited to acts endangering the safety of the ship or the life or health of persons. However, provisions imposing such sanctions which relate more generally to breaches of labour discipline (such as desertion, absence without leave or disobedience), often supplemented by provisions under which seafarers may be forcibly returned on board ship, are incompatible with the Convention.

The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that numerous requests concerning the Committee's comments had been communicated to the Department of Transport, which is responsible for administering and applying the above legislation, with a view to amending these provisions. However, the Government indicates in its latest report that no positive response has been communicated by this Department as feedback to the observation made by the Committee.

While noting the Government's renewed commitment to review national provisions and to ensure compliance with the ratified Conventions, the Committee trusts that the necessary measures will be taken in the near future with a view to bringing the above provisions of the Seamen (Foreign) Act and the Merchant Shipping Act into conformity with the Convention and that the Government will soon be in a position to report the progress achieved in this regard.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the Government's report, the comments of the National Confederation of Private Business Institution (CONFIEP) communicated by the Government with its report, and the comments on the application of the Convention made by the General Confederation of Workers of Peru (CGTP), which were forwarded to the Government on 16 November 2009.

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. 1. Forced labour in indigenous communities. For many years, the Committee has been examining the situation of members of indigenous communities who are victims of forced labour practices (slavery, debt bondage and serfdom), particularly in sectors such as agriculture, stock-raising and forestry. It referred in particular to the region of Atalaya, the harvesting of chestnuts in Madre de Dios and widespread forced labour in illegal timber activities in the region of Ucayali. The Committee noted the establishment in 2007 of the National Commission to Combat Forced Labour and the approval of the National Plan to Combat Forced Labour, the objective of which is to address structural issues (the vulnerability of victims) and take coordinated measures to resolve situations of forced labour in practice. The Committee noted the various components of the National Plan and requested the Government to provide information on their implementation and the results achieved. The Committee observes in this respect the CGTP's view that the measures adopted for the implementation of the Plan are inadequate. The CONFIEP however gives a favourable assessment of the manner in which the Government is combating forced labour.

Legislative measures. One of the objectives of the National Plan is the existence of legislation that is in conformity with international standards respecting freedom of work and rules which give a legal basis for action to combat forced labour. The Government has previously acknowledged that the legislation does not contain specific provisions encompassing the whole of the issue of forced labour and that it is necessary to update and harmonize the penal, civil and labour legislation on this matter. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its last report that there is not yet legislation specifically criminalizing forced labour and determining its constituent elements, although a legislative proposal is being studied which should be examined soon by the Congress. The Government, however, specifies that other provisions of the national legislation protect the right to freedom of work, such as section 168 of the Penal Code, which establishes a sentence of imprisonment for any person who obliges or threatens another person with a view to the performance of work without receiving the corresponding remuneration, and section 153 which criminalizes and defines the constituent elements of trafficking in persons. The Government considers that, in view of the fact that this section defines the constituent elements of the crime of trafficking in persons with reference to its purpose, namely exploitation, the victims of forced labour could benefit from the protection and assistance guaranteed on the basis of this section. The Government finally hopes that the legislation will soon be supplemented by a Bill which will bring the national legislation into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee notes this information. The Committee recalls in this respect that forced labour, as established by the Convention, is a broader concept than trafficking in persons and that it is important for national jurisdictions to have precise provisions, taking into account the principle of the strict interpretation of penal law. The Committee therefore hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that the legislative initiative to which it refers results in the adoption of penal provisions specifically criminalizing forced labour and defining the constituent elements of forced labour so as to cover all the forced labour practices existing in the country. Finally, referring to its previous observation, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would indicate whether it has followed up the proposal in the National Plan to formulate a Bill to regulate private employment agencies and labour recruitment systems, by giving emphasis to the prevention of forced labour and by including them within the competence of the labour inspectorate.

Labour inspection. The Committee notes that the National Plan envisages the reinforcement of the labour inspectorate, particularly through the establishment of mobile inspection units in areas difficult to access and the establishment of machinery to receive complaints and forward them to the corresponding services. The Government indicates that a special labour inspection unit to combat forced labour (GEIT) was created in August 2008. This unit, composed of five labour inspectors and headed by a supervisor, undertook its first mission between September and December 2008. The mission aimed at inspecting timber activities in the Department of Loreto and to develop the investigatory capacities of the GEIT. The GEIT concluded that in this Department the system of "habilitación" remains a widespread means of recruiting mixed race and indigenous labour for timber extraction. The second mission consisted of an operational plan to inspect export enterprises in the timber sector, and particularly in forestry concessions that are distant from towns. The Government adds that financial difficulties have prevented the GEIT from travelling to distant areas and communities. It further indicates that the GEIT has conducted preliminary investigations into situations of forced labour in agro-industrial and mining activities.

The Committee notes this information. It also notes that, in its comments, the CGTP emphasizes that the GEIT is established in the capital, Lima, and not in the area where forced labour is widespread, namely in the Amazon forest. This makes it difficult to achieve the objectives set out in the National Plan. The Committee considers that the specialization of a group of inspectors in combating forced labour constitutes a positive element. However, it observes with concern that the GEIT does not appear to have the financial resources to carry out its missions. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted to ensure that the GEIT is provided with adequate human and material resources to be able to travel rapidly, effectively and safely throughout the national territory. Please indicate the number of inspections carried out, the situations of forced labour reported and the judicial action taken as a result of the violations reported.

Awareness raising and prevention. The Committee notes the detailed information provided by the Government concerning the measures adopted to disseminate information and raise awareness on the problem of forced labour. It observes in particular the draft communication strategy which, in the absence of financing, has not yet been implemented. It also notes the web page of the Ministry of Labour and Employment Promotion devoted to forced labour; the decentralized action taken by the Ministry of Education to disseminate the National Plan, and to carry out awareness-raising and prevention activities among teachers, students and parents, with emphasis on rural areas where the population is most vulnerable; the broadcasting of television programmes on forced labour on the State channel; the awareness-raising and training activities undertaken in training institutions for the police and officials in institutions working in fields linked to the issue of forced labour. The Committee encourages the Government to continue developing this type of awareness-raising activities and requests it to provide information on this subject. It would also be grateful if the Government would indicate the measures adopted to improve the identification of victims and establish their number, and on whether the proposals in the National Plan have been implemented for the preparation of studies on forced labour in certain sectors and the periodic development of assessments of the forced labour situation.

2. Domestic work under conditions of forced labour. The Committee noted previously the allegations of forced labour practices of which certain women domestic workers are reported to be the victims. It notes the information provided by the Government on the numerous activities undertaken to ensure that women domestic workers are aware of their rights, both through training workshops and information campaigns (distribution of brochures, posters, television programmes). The Committee observes that the CGTP confirms in its comments that many women domestic workers are subject to violation of their rights amounting to forced labour. The trade union refers to women workers who are exploited and obliged to work over 18 hours a day without receiving remuneration, or with their remuneration being paid in kind, and who are deprived of their freedom of movement or their identity papers. The CGTP emphasizes that it is necessary to amend the legislation and to develop a quantitative and qualitative assessment of forced labour in this sector since, in the absence of such an evaluation, it is difficult to combat this form of forced labour. The State should also make available to women domestic workers the tools through which they can assert their rights. The Committee trusts that the Government will take every necessary measure to ensure the protection of women domestic workers against the imposition of practices which amount to forced labour, both at the legislative level and in practice, providing the necessary assistance so as to enable them to assert their rights and denounce any abuses of which they may be victims.

3. Trafficking in persons. In addition to the adoption of the provisions in the Penal Code which criminalize and define the constituent elements of trafficking in persons, referred to above, the Committee notes the creation of the Division to Combat Trafficking in Persons in the Criminal Investigation Directorate of the National Police. The Government indicates that this Division works with the GEIT on the complaints lodged over the telephone line established for that purpose by the Ministry of the Interior concerning trafficking in persons for the exploitation of their labour. The Government also refers to the system for the recording and compilation of statistics on the crime of trafficking in persons and similar offences, through which indicators are established on complaints, investigations, locations, offences, identities and types of trafficking. A telephone line available 24 hours a day, seven days a week, has also been set up with professionals to provide assistance and advice to victims of trafficking and who can, where appropriate, forward complaints to the police services. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the measures adopted to combat trafficking in persons, and particularly to protect and assist victims. Please provide information on the results obtained by the Division to Combat Trafficking in Persons of the National Police, the difficulties encountered and the measures adopted to overcome them.

Article 25. Effective and strictly applied penal sanctions. The Committee previously noted the lack of specific provisions in criminal law to repress and punish forced labour, which prevented effect to be given to Article 25 of the Convention, under which the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour shall be punishable as a penal offence and the penalties imposed have to be really adequate and strictly enforced. The Committee notes that the Government provides information in its report on certain procedures that have been established to enable victims to denounce their situation (free telephone line for trafficking in persons and on-line denunciation on the web page devoted to forced labour of the Ministry of Labour). The Committee observes that the Government does not provide any information on the initiation of prosecutions against persons charged with the exaction of forced labour.

The Committee emphasizes that, as indicated above, forced labour practices in Peru take various forms (including practices similar to slavery or debt bondage of indigenous populations and exploitation of women domestic workers) and it appears that the legislation that is currently in force is inadequate for the punishment of those responsible for these practices. The Committee observes the emphasis placed by the CGTP on the fact that, when situations of forced labour are identified, the lack of an adequate legal basis for bringing criminal charges before the court prevents the punishment of those responsible. In these circumstances, the Committee refers to its comments set out above on the need to adopt specific provisions criminalizing forced labour and defining its constituent elements, as a basis upon which the police and prosecution authorities can initiate judicial procedures against those responsible for the various forms of forced labour existing in Peru. With regard to trafficking in persons, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the effect given in practice to sections 153 and 153A of the Penal Code and to provide copies of relevant court rulings. Please also indicate whether criminal courts have handed down decisions under section 168 of the Penal Code.

Finally, the Committee notes that, under the terms of section 25 of the Regulations issued under the General Act on Labour Inspection (Supreme Decree No. 019-2006-TR), forced labour, whether paid or not, and trafficking in, or the abduction of persons for the purpose of forced labour constitutes a very serious offence from the labour relations perspective and is punishable with an administrative sanction (fine). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the penalties applied under this provision, with an indication of their number and amount.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1960)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. In comments it has been making for a number of years, the Committee has been referring to the following provisions of the Revised Penal Code, under which penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) may be imposed:

- section 142 (inciting to sedition by means of speeches, proclamations, writings or emblems; uttering seditious words or speeches; writing, publishing or circulating scurrilous libels against the Government);
- section 154 (publishing any false news which may endanger the public order or cause damage to the interest or credit of the State, by means of printing, lithography, or any other means of publication).

While having noted the Government's views expressed in its previous report, according to which the above provisions punish the acts of making speeches, writings or proclamations "that create a clear and present danger to the public safety, public order and public good", the Committee draws the Government's attention to the explanations contained in paragraphs 152–166 of its General Survey of 2007 on the eradication of forced labour, in which it has considered that the range of activities which must be protected under Article 1(a) of the Convention comprises the freedom to express political or ideological views, which may be exercised orally and through the press and other communications media, as well as various other generally recognized rights, such as the right of association and of assembly, through which citizens seek to secure the dissemination and acceptance of their views and the adoption of policies and laws reflecting them, and which also may be affected by measures of political coercion. The Committee observes that the above provisions of the Revised Penal Code are worded in terms broad enough to lend themselves to be applied as a means of punishment for the expression of views and, in so far as they are enforceable with sanctions involving compulsory labour, they fall within the scope of the Convention.

The Committee trusts that the necessary measures will be taken in the near future in order to amend or repeal sections 142 and 154 of the Revised Penal Code so as to bring legislation into conformity with the Convention, and that the Government will soon be in a position to provide information on the progress made in this regard. Pending the amendment, the Committee again requests the Government to provide information on the application of sections 142 and 154 in practice, including sample copies of relevant court decisions defining or illustrating their scope.

Article 1(d). Punishment for having participated in strikes. For a number of years, the Committee has been referring to certain legislative provisions, under which, in the event of a planned or current strike in an industry considered "indispensable to the national interest", the Secretary of Labour and Employment may assume jurisdiction over the dispute and settle it or certify it for compulsory arbitration. Furthermore, the President may determine the industries "indispensable to the national interest" and assume jurisdiction over a labour dispute (section 263(g) of the Labor Code). The declaration of a strike after such "assumption of jurisdiction" or submission to compulsory arbitration is prohibited (section 264), and participation in an illegal strike is punishable by imprisonment (section 272(a) of the Labor Code), which involves an obligation to perform labour (pursuant to section 1727 of the Revised Administrative Code). The revised Penal Code also lays down sanctions of imprisonment for participants in illegal strikes (section 146).

The Committee recalls that Article 1(d) of the Convention prohibits the use of any form of forced or compulsory labour as a punishment for having participated in strikes. It refers in this connection to the explanations contained in paragraph 189 of its 2007 General Survey, in which it has considered that, regardless of the legality of the strike action, any sanctions imposed should not be disproportionate to the seriousness of the violations committed, and the authorities should not have recourse to measures of imprisonment for the mere fact of organizing or participating in a strike. The Committee points out, however, that the Convention does not prohibit the punishment of acts of violence, assault or destruction of property committed in connection with the strike.

Referring also to its comments addressed to the Government under the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), likewise ratified by Philippines, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the necessary measures will be taken to amend or repeal the above provisions of the Labour Code so as to ensure that no penalties involving compulsory labour can be imposed for the participation in a strike, in order to bring legislation into conformity with the Convention. It asks the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the progress achieved in this regard.

Russian Federation

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1956)

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Trafficking in persons. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the communication from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), according to which thousands of persons were trafficked from the Russian Federation to other countries, including Canada, China, Germany, Israel, Italy, Japan, Spain, Thailand and the United States. Internal trafficking within the Russian Federation also reportedly took place; women were generally forced to work as prostitutes while men were trafficked into agricultural or construction work. The Government indicated in its 2007 report that detection of human trafficking cases had increased six-fold in three years, and several dozens of organized criminal groups engaged in recruiting Russian citizens for the purpose of sexual and labour exploitation in the countries of Western Europe, Middle East and North America had been uncovered. According to the 2009 Global Report on forced labour under the follow-up to the ILO Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work, recent data from the Russian Federation and other countries of the Commonwealth of Independent States point to a steady increase in the number of identified persons trafficked for labour exploitation.

The Committee previously noted the information provided by the Government concerning prosecution of offences of human trafficking under the new section 127.1 of the Criminal Code. However, in spite of the legal prohibition and punishment of human trafficking, it still remains a source of serious concern in practice. In this connection, the Committee notes with regret that no progress has been achieved as regards the adoption of the draft Law on Combating Human Trafficking, which provides for a system of bodies to combat trafficking and contains provisions concerning prevention of trafficking, as well as protection and rehabilitation of victims, to which the Government referred in its earlier reports.

The Committee therefore expresses the firm hope that the Government will take immediate steps with a view to ensuring that the draft Law on Combating Human Trafficking is adopted in the near future. It also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the application in practice of section 127.1 of the Criminal Code, supplying sample copies of the relevant court decisions in order to demonstrate the effectiveness of this provision and to indicate the penalties imposed on perpetrators. Please also provide information on the practical measures taken or envisaged to prevent, suppress and combat trafficking in human beings.

Sierra Leone

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1(1), and 2(1) of the Convention. Compulsory agricultural work. Over many years, the Committee has been referring to section 8(h) of the Chiefdom Councils Act (Cap. 61), under which compulsory cultivation may be imposed on "natives". On numerous occasions, it requested the Government to repeal or amend this provision. The Committee also noted the Government's statement that the abovementioned section is not in conformity with article 9 of the Constitution and would be held unenforceable. The Committee takes due note of the Government's repeated indication that section 8(h) is not applicable in practice and that information on any amendment of this section would be communicated to the ILO in the near future. As the Government has repeatedly indicated since 1964 that this legislation would be amended, the Committee reiterates firm hope that the necessary measures will at last be taken in order to bring section 8(h) of the Chiefdom Councils Act into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice. It requests the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the progress made in this regard.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Sri Lanka

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1950)

The Committee notes the information supplied by the Government in its report, as well as the comments made by the National Trade Union Federation (NTUF) on the application of the Convention.

Article 2(2)(d) of the Convention. Emergency regulations. For many years, the Committee has been commenting on the state of emergency declared on 20 June 1989 under the Public Security Ordinance, 1947, and the powers of the President under section 10 of the Emergency (Miscellaneous Provisions and Powers) Regulation (adopted in 1989 and revised in 1994, 2000, 2005 and 2006). The Committee recalls, referring to paragraphs 62–64 of its General Survey of 2007 on the eradication of forced labour, that recourse to compulsory labour under emergency powers should apply only in restricted circumstances where a calamity or threatened calamity occurs, and the legislation governing that issue should clearly set forth that the power to exact compulsory labour is limited in extent and duration to what is strictly required to cope with the said circumstances.

The Committee has noted the Government's statement that the civil war, which previously necessitated such emergency regulations, had ended in May 2005. However, the Government adds that, in this post-conflict period, it is too early to lift the emergency regulation in the interests of public security, protection of public order and the maintenance of supplies and services essential to the life of the community. The Government additionally indicates that it has not engaged in practices which would be tantamount to forced labour within the context of the Convention.

While noting this information, the Committee firmly hopes that the Government will take action without delay to bring legislation into conformity with the Convention, and that the Government will report the progress made in this regard.

Articles 1(1) and 2(1). Compulsory public service. In its previous comments, the Committee has referred to sections 3(1), 4(1)(c) and 4(5) of the Compulsory Public Service Act, No. 70 of 1961, under which compulsory public service of up to five years may be imposed on graduates. The Committee has noted the Government's repeated statement in its reports, including its latest report, that no prosecutions under the Act have been reported so far. The Government also indicates that the decision to repeal the Act is under consideration by the Ministry of Public Administration and Home Affairs. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Compulsory Public Service Act will be repealed in the near future and the legislation will be brought into compliance with the Convention and the indicated practice. It asks the Government to provide in its next report information on the progress made in this regard.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Sudan

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee has noted the information provided by the Government to the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in a communication received on 6 June 2010, to which it attached its response to the Committee's comments made under the present Convention and the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182). It has also noted the discussion that took place, in June 2010, in the Conference Committee, which has requested the Government, in its conclusions, to provide a full report for examination by the Committee of Experts at its forthcoming session. The Committee has further noted the observations dated 26 August 2010 received from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), concerning the application of the Convention by Sudan, which was sent to the Government, on 7 September 2010, for any comments it may wish to make on the matters raised therein.

The Committee notes that no report has been supplied by the Government at the request of the Conference Committee, and no comments have been provided in response to the above observations by the ITUC. The Committee firmly hopes that the Government will provide a full report for examination by the Committee at its next session, as well as its comments on the observations by the ITUC.

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Abolition of forced labour practices. For many years, the Committee has been referring, in relation to the application of the Convention, to the continuing existence of the practices of abduction and forced labour exploitation, which affected thousands of women and children in the regions of the country where an armed conflict was under way. The Committee recalls that this case has been discussed repeatedly over the years in its own observations and on numerous occasions by the Conference Committee. The Committee has repeatedly pointed out that the situations concerned constitute gross violations of the Convention, since the victims are forced to perform work for which they have not offered themselves voluntarily, under extremely harsh conditions, and combined with ill treatment which may include torture and death. The Committee has considered that the scope and gravity of the problem are such that it is necessary to take urgent action that is commensurate in scope and systematic. The Government has been therefore requested to provide detailed information on the measures taken to combat the practice of forced labour through abduction of women and children and to ensure that, in accordance with the Convention, penal sanctions are imposed on perpetrators.

Conference Committee on the Application of Standards. The Committee notes that, in its conclusions adopted in June 2010, the Conference Committee noted the Government's efforts to improve the human rights situation in the country and, in particular, information about the recent elections which were held in the country, which were considered as a new step towards the full implementation of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement of 2005. While noting these positive developments, as well as the Government's renewed statement that after the end of the civil war abductions had stopped completely, the Conference Committee observed once again that there was no verifiable evidence that forced labour had been completely eradicated in practice. In this regard, the Conference Committee noted with regret that the latest statistics concerning the Committee for the Eradication of Abduction of Women and Children (CEAWC) activities (showing the numbers of cases of victims identification and reunification with their families) dated back to May 2008, and that no updated information of this kind had been provided by the Government. The Conference Committee noted once again the convergence of allegations and the broad consensus among United Nations bodies, the representative organizations of workers and non-governmental organizations concerning the continuing existence and scope of the violations of human rights and international humanitarian law in certain regions of the country. It also noted with concern that there was a lack of accountability of perpetrators and that victim rehabilitation measures were not sufficient. The Conference Committee strongly urged the Government to pursue its efforts, including through the CEAWC, in order to ensure the full application of the Convention, both in law and in practice. It expressed the firm hope that the Government would provide detailed information in its next report for examination by the Committee of Experts, indicating, in particular, whether the cases of exaction of forced labour had stopped completely, whether the victims had been reunified with their families and received adequate compensation and rehabilitation, and whether perpetrators had been punished, particularly those unwilling to cooperate. Noting the Government's request for technical assistance from the Office, the Conference Committee invited the ILO to provide the necessary assistance.

United Nations bodies. The Committee previously noted that, in United Nations Security Council resolution 1881 (2009), the Security Council had expressed concern at the continued seriousness of the security situation and deterioration of the humanitarian situation in Darfur and reiterated its condemnation of all violations of human rights and international humanitarian law in that region. The resolution emphasized the need to bring to justice the perpetrators of such crimes and urged the Government of Sudan to comply with its obligations in this respect. The Committee also noted a report of the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in the Sudan (A/HRC/11/14, June 2009), in which the Special Rapporteur observed that, despite some positive steps in the area of law reform, improvement of the human rights situation on the ground continued to remain a significant challenge. Thus, in Darfur, human rights violations and breaches of international humanitarian law continued to be committed by all parties; in southern Sudan, several hundred civilians were killed in tribal conflict and attacks by Lords Resistance Army (LRA) and a number of women and children were abducted. According to the report, impunity remained an ongoing and serious concern in all areas of Sudan, allegations of violations of human rights were not duly investigated, many perpetrators of serious crimes had not been brought to justice and reparations had not been provided to victims. The Special Rapporteur reiterated all previously unimplemented human rights recommendations contained in her reports and, in particular, a recommendation to ensure that all allegations of violations of human rights and international humanitarian law are duly investigated and that perpetrators are promptly brought to justice (paragraph 92(d)).

The Committee notes the report of the independent expert on the situation of human rights in the Sudan (A/HRC/15/CRP.1) issued pursuant to Decision 14/117 by the Human Rights Council and noted by Resolution 15/27 adopted by the Human Rights Council (A/HRC/RES/15/27), which provided an overview of developments and activities during the period from 1 May to 31 August 2010. The report states that, during the abovementioned reporting period, while the Government continued to take steps towards democratic transformation, the general human rights situation in the Sudan deteriorated. In Darfur, clashes between government forces and the armed movements as well as inter-communal violence continued to cause further death and displacement among the civilian population. The situation in Southern Sudan continued to be characterized by "high volatility in localized areas affecting the civilian population, especially women and children, as well as increasing human rights violations by the Sudan People's Liberation Army (SPLA)". The report states that concrete measures aimed at ensuring law and order and addressing accountability and impunity should be urgently considered by both the national Government and the government of southern Sudan. The report reiterates all previously unimplemented human rights recommendations, including those made by the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in the Sudan, and recommends to the Government, inter alia, to "ensure that all allegations of violations of human rights and international humanitarian law are duly investigated and that the perpetrators are brought to justice promptly, in particular those with command responsibilities".

Comments from workers' organizations. In the observations dated 26 August 2010 referred to above, the ITUC noted that there continued to be serious problems with forced labour and compensation of its victims. According to the ITUC, the practice of abduction and forced labour exploitation is still in place affecting thousands of women and children in armed conflict areas. The Government continues to refuse to punish forced labour offenders, insisting that such cases will be settled through the traditional community chief mediation process. However, in the meantime, there is no documented evidence of such informal community mediation process having yielded positive results. The ITUC further alleges that there are still cases of involuntary returns of some abductees and extensive cases of unaccompanied children, most of whom have lost their families due to death and displacement in the war. The ITUC considers that the Government must strengthen the work of the CEAWC in terms of prosecution of perpetrators of abduction and forced labour, as a number of perpetrators remain unwilling to cooperate. Finally, the ITUC welcomes the Government's willingness to accept technical assistance from the ILO.

The Government's response. The Committee notes that the Government's response to the Committee's comments, attached to a communication received on 6 June 2010 referred to above, contains the information already supplied to the ILO in November 2008, in response to a communication by the ITUC dated 29 August 2008. This information relates, inter alia, to the activities of the CEAWC up to the end of April 2008, including statistics concerning documented cases of abductions and cases of reunification of abducted persons with their families, which has already been noted by the Committee. The Government confirms once again its strong and continued commitment to completely eradicate the phenomenon of abductions and to provide continued support to the CEAWC. It also reiterates its previous statement that abductions have stopped completely, which, according to the Government, has also been confirmed by the Dinka Chiefs Committee (DCC). For that reason, the Government has urged once again that this case be dismissed and its discussion stopped in the ILO, since it has already been satisfactorily dealt with according to the reports of the UN specialized agencies. Concerning the situation in Darfur, the Government reiterated its view that, since it was under examination by the UN Security Council and the African Union, the issues concerned should not be discussed in the ILO, in order to avoid duplication of work. As regards the prosecution of perpetrators, the Government repeated its previous indications that the CEAWC, which was initially of the view that legal action was the best measure to eradicate abductions, had been requested by all the tribes concerned including the DCC not to resort to legal action, unless the amicable efforts of the tribes are not successful. The Government reiterated its view that legal action takes a very long time and is very expensive, and that it could not build peace among the tribes concerned and did not correspond to the spirit of national reconciliation. The Committee also notes the statement of the Government representative to the Conference Committee in June 2010 that bringing perpetrators to justice would have a negative impact on helping people return or settle; however, the Government has credited those who wished to submit claims with available information. He also stated that the Government had done what it could to bring the perpetrators to justice, however it could not force people to bring up complaints, but just encourage them to do so.

While noting this information, the Committee strongly urges the Government once again to redouble its efforts in order to completely eradicate the forced labour practices which constitute a gross violation of the Convention, and in particular, to resolve the cases of abductions in all the regions of the country and to ensure the victims' right to be reunified with their families. While noting the Government's renewed commitment to resolve the problem, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will continue to provide detailed information on the liberation and reunification process, supplying updated and reliable statistics supported by CEAWC reports. Having also noted the Government's repeated statement that abductions have stopped completely, the Committee observes with concern that this statement is in contradiction with other reliable sources of information. It again refers in this connection to the broad consensus among the United Nations bodies, the representative organizations of workers and non-governmental organizations concerning the continuing existence and scope of the violations of human rights and international humanitarian law in certain regions of the country. The Committee reiterates the need for the Government to take urgent measures, in accordance with the recommendations of the relevant international bodies and agencies, to put an end to all human rights violations and widespread impunity, which would help to create better conditions for the full observance of the forced labour Conventions. Noting also the Government's request for technical assistance of the ILO, the Committee hopes that the Government will take all the necessary measures, with the Office's assistance, in order to ensure full compliance with the Convention, both in law and in practice, and that the Government will provide, in its next report, information on the progress made in this regard.

Article 25. Penalties for the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour. The Committee previously noted the Criminal Code provisions punishing the offence of abduction with penalties of imprisonment, and requested the Government to take measures to ensure that, in accordance with the Convention, penal sanctions are imposed on perpetrators. The Committee has noted the Government's repeated indication in its reports that the CEAWC, which was initially of the view that legal action was the best measure to eradicate the abductions, has been requested by all the tribes concerned not to resort to legal action, unless the amicable efforts of the tribes are not successful. The Government reiterates its view that, within the context of the comprehensive peace process, there is an argument for not pursuing prosecutions against those responsible for abductions and forced labour in the spirit of national reconciliation.

The Committee recalls again in this connection that, under Article 25 of the Convention, "the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour shall be punishable as a penal offence, and it shall be an obligation on any Member ratifying this Convention to ensure that the penalties imposed by law are really adequate and are strictly enforced". The Committee therefore considers that the failure to apply penal sanctions in respect of perpetrators is contrary to this provision of the Convention and may have the effect of creating an environment of impunity for abductors who exploit forced labour.

The Committee urges the Government to take all the necessary measures to ensure that legal proceedings are instituted against perpetrators, particularly against those unwilling to cooperate, and penal sanctions will be imposed on persons convicted of having exacted forced labour, as required by the Convention. The Committee again requests the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the application in practice of the penal provision punishing the offence of abduction, as well as the provisions punishing kidnapping and the exaction of forced labour (sections 161, 162 and 163 of the Criminal Code), supplying sample copies of the relevant court decisions and indicating the penalties imposed.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1969)

Article 1(c) of the Convention. Sanctions involving compulsory labour as a means of labour discipline. The Committee previously noted that sections 131–133 of the Labour Relations Act BE 2518 (1975), under which penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) may be imposed on any employee who violates or fails to comply with an agreement on terms of employment or a decision on a labour dispute under sections 18, 22–24, 29 and 35(4) of the Labour Relations Act, were incompatible with the Convention. The Government states in its latest report that the Ministry of Labour (MOL) is trying its best to take the necessary measures to bring the Labour Relations Act into closer conformity with the Convention. To this end, the Government indicates that its Committee on Revision of Labour Relations Laws in conformity with the principles of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), will take into consideration the provisions of the Labour Relations Act BE 2518 that are in contravention of Convention No. 105. The Committee notes in particular the Government's indications concerning an analysis to be conducted by the above Committee on the conformity of the Act with the Convention.

The Committee reiterates the firm hope that the necessary measures will soon be taken with a view to bringing the above provisions of the Labour Relations Act into conformity with the Convention, either by repealing sanctions involving compulsory labour or by limiting their scope to acts endangering the life or health of persons. It asks the Government to provide a copy of any proposed amendments to the Labour Relations Act elaborated to this end.

Article 1(d). Sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for having participated in strikes. The Committee has previously referred to the following provisions of the Labour Relations Act BE 2518 (1975), under which penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) may be imposed for participation in strikes:

- section 140 read in conjunction with section 35(2): if the minister orders the strikers to return to work, being of the opinion that the strike may affect the national economy or cause hardship to the public or endanger national security or be contrary to public order;
- section 139 read in conjunction with section 34(5): if the matter is awaiting the decision of the Labour Relations Committee or a decision has been given by the minister under section 23(1), (2), (6) or (8) or by the Labour Relations Committee under section 24.

While noting the Government's intention to bring these provisions into account of the Committee on Revision of Labour Relations Laws referred to above, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the necessary measures will be taken in the near future with a view to bringing the above provisions of the Labour Relations Act into conformity with the Convention, by ensuring that no sanctions involving compulsory labour can be imposed for the mere fact of a peaceful participation in a strike.

Previously, the Committee had referred to the State Enterprise Labour Relations Act BE 2543 (2000) (SELRA), which prohibits strikes in state enterprises (section 33), violation of this prohibition being punishable with imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) for a term of up to one year; this penalty is doubled in the case of a person who instigates this offence (section 77). The Committee notes the Government's indications in its report that the Committee on Revision of Labour Relations Laws referred to above is going to take into account the feasibility of revising the SELRA to bring it into conformity with the Convention. The Committee trusts that the necessary measures will soon be taken with a view to amending the above provisions of the SELRA in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention, by providing that no sanctions involving compulsory labour can be imposed for the mere fact of a peaceful participation in a strike. It asks the Government to provide, in its next report, information on progress made in this regard.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1963)

Article 1(c) and (d) of the Convention. Sanctions involving compulsory labour for breaches of labour discipline and participation in strikes. For many years, the Committee has been referring to sections 157 and 158 of the Shipping Act, 1987, section 8(1) of the Trade Disputes and Protection of Property Act and section 69(1)(d) and (2) of the Industrial Relations Act, under which penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour under the Prisons Rules) may be imposed for various breaches of labour discipline and participation in strikes in circumstances where the life, personal safety or health of persons are not endangered. The Government indicated in its earlier reports that efforts were under way to amend the provisions mentioned above and that no sanctions had been imposed under these provisions in practice.

The Government states in its latest report that no amendments have been made to the above legislation, but the Ministry of Labour and Small and Micro Enterprise Development has included the Industrial Relations Act in its Legislative Review Programme for the period 2009–10. However, the Trade Disputes and Protection of Property Act has not been put up for any legislative review in the upcoming parliamentary term. No information has been supplied in this regard about the Shipping Act, 1987.

The Committee trusts that the necessary measures will be taken in the near future in order to amend the abovementioned provisions with a view to bringing legislation into conformity with the Convention. Noting that the legislative amendments required have been under consideration for many years, the Committee asks the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the progress made in the revision of the Industrial Relations Act, as well as on any steps taken to amend the Trade Disputes and Protection of Property Act and the Shipping Act, in order to ensure compliance with the Convention.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1998)

The Committee notes with satisfaction that the 1998 “Regulations on the administration of penitentiaries and work centres of detention centres and administration, accounting and bidding of work centres” and the 1967 “Regulations pertaining to the administration of penitentiaries and detention centres and to the execution of sentences”, under which prison labour was compulsory for both convicted and remand prisoners, were repealed, respectively, by the Regulation on the Administration and Bidding of Penitentiaries and Work Centres of Detention Institutions, adopted in December 2005 and the Regulation on Administration of Penitentiaries and Execution of Sentences, adopted in 2006.

The Committee had previously noted the adoption of section 114 of the Act on the Execution of Sentences and Security Measures (No. 5275 of December 2004), under which prisoners awaiting trial or detained without trial may not be compelled to work.

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Trafficking in persons. In its previous comments, the Committee noted a communication received from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) (now the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC)), which pointed out the gravity and extent of the practice of trafficking in persons in Turkey. The Committee had also noted the information provided by the Government on measures adopted to combat this phenomenon. The Committee requested the Government to provide further information on measures taken to strengthen action against trafficking in persons, particularly with regard to prevention and protection measures, supplying information on intergovernmental cooperation, police training and other efforts to improve law enforcement, as well as on convictions and sentences imposed.

The Committee notes the comments on the application of the Convention by Turkey, made by the Turkish Confederation of Employers’ Associations (TİSK), which concerned, inter alia, the measures taken by the Government to combat trafficking in persons.

The Committee notes the Government’s indications in its report concerning the amendments made to certain legislative acts, such as the Work Permit for Foreign Workers Act (No. 4817 of 2003), the Citizenship Law and the Highway Transportation Law, which introduced certain measures aiming at the prevention of trafficking as an organized crime.

The Committee notes the information in the Government’s report concerning other measures it has taken, which include, inter alia, the following:

- training and awareness-raising activities for law enforcement officers, organized in collaboration with the International Organization for Migration (IOM);
- implementation, in collaboration with the European Union, of a project on “Strengthening the institutional capacity with a view to combating trafficking in human beings”, that resulted in an action plan determining the activities and targets for the beneficiary institutions and organizations in the short-, medium- and long-term perspective; and which is waiting to be signed for approval;
- bilateral agreements to combat human trafficking in cooperation with source countries such as Belarus, Georgia, Azerbaijan, Ukraine, Republic of Moldova and Kyrgyzstan;
- bilateral “cooperation protocols” signed by the General Directorate of Security and national NGOs, aiming at improving the capacity to identify and provide assistance to potential sex trafficking victims, and establishing “victims’ shelter houses” in various municipalities;
- the launching in 2009 of a project, within the framework of financial cooperation with the Swedish International Development Agency (SIDA), with a view to building the capacity of local NGOs at the provincial level to improve victims’ identification, and contributing to the implementation of a national action plan.

The Committee further notes the information provided by the Government in its report concerning the amendment of section 80 of the Turkish Penal Code in 2006 so as to include forced prostitution in the human trafficking definition. It also notes the information in the Government’s report on recent law enforcement efforts, including the references to judicial cases involving the arrest, prosecution and punishment of perpetrators. The Committee hopes that the Government will continue to provide information on progress on the above measures, as well as information on any other measures taken or contemplated to prevent, suppress and punish trafficking in persons. In particular, please continue to provide information concerning the application in practice of sections 80, 117(2) and 227(3) of the Penal Code, including information on convictions, and supplying sample copies of the relevant court decisions.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in reply to its earlier comments, including copies of legislative texts and court decisions. It also notes the comment made by the Turkish Confederation of Employers’ Associations (TİSK) on the application of the Convention.

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Political coercion and punishment for holding or expressing views opposed to the established system. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government as regards the application in practice of sections 215–218 of the Penal Code. It also notes the adoption of Law No. 5759 of 30 April 2008, which has amended section 301 of the Penal Code that provides for penal sanctions for insulting or vilifying, inter alia, “Turkism” and various state authorities. The Committee notes, in particular, the amendment of paragraph 4 of section 301, according to which the expression of ideas in the form of criticism shall not be punished. While noting this amendment, the Committee asks the Government to supply information about the application of section 301 of the Penal Code in practice, including information on any prosecutions, convictions and sentences under its provisions, in particular as regards paragraph 4, so as to enable the Committee to ascertain that the expression of political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system are not punished with penalties involving compulsory labour.

In its earlier comments, the Committee noted with regard to section 8 of the Act on the Fight against Terrorism (No. 3713 of 1991) that, by virtue of Act No. 4744 of 6 February 2002, a penalty of imprisonment in this section was replaced with fines, and it requested the Government to provide clarification on the phrase “unless such acts necessitate a heavier penalty” and to supply copies of the court decisions defining or illustrating the scope of this provision. The Committee previously noted that, in June 2006, the Grand National Assembly adopted amendments to the Act. Noting that no information concerning this point was provided in the Government’s report, the Committee hopes that, in its next report, the Government will clarify the provision for penalties in section 8 and communicate a copy of the 2006 amendments to the Act, including the relevant provisions regarding penalties. Please also supply updated information relating to the application in practice of the Act, as amended, including sample copies of the relevant court decisions and indicating the penalties imposed.

For a number of years, the Committee has been referring to provisions of the 1965 Act concerning political parties, which prohibits political parties from asserting the existence in Turkey of any minorities based on nationality, culture, religion or language and from attempting to disturb national security by conserving, developing or propagating languages and cultures other than the Turkish language or culture. It noted that penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) could be imposed under sections 80–82, read in conjunction with section 117, of the Political Parties Act (No. 2820 of 1983). The Committee noted the Government’s indication in its 2003 report that changes were to be made in the Political Parties Act, in accordance with the Emergency Action Plan published on 3 January 2003, with a view to ensuring that the whole population would be able to participate in political parties and to make possible the establishment of equity and justice in political representation.

Referring to the explanations contained in paragraphs 133–140 of its General Survey of 1979 on the abolition of forced labour, the Committee points out once again, that prohibitions enforced by penalties involving compulsory labour which affect the constitution or functioning of political parties or associations, either generally or where they advocate certain political or ideological views are incompatible with Article 1(a) of the Convention. The Committee therefore expresses the firm hope that measures will be taken to bring the Political Parties Act into conformity with the Convention. Having also noted the Government’s earlier indication that the penalties applicable to prohibited activities under sections 80–82 of the Political Parties Act had been “re-regulated” under the Penal Code (Act No. 5237 of 2004), the Committee asks the Government to clarify how the application of these sections is influenced by the application of the Penal Code, indicating the relevant penal provisions.

Article 1(b). Use of conscripts for purposes of economic development. The Committee notes the Government’s statement in its report confirming its previous indication that Act No. 3358, which amended section 10 of the Military Service Act, No. 1111, was no longer applied after 1991. The Committee previously noted from the Government’s 2005 report that a new draft Military Service Bill aiming at bringing legislation into conformity with “current conditions” had been examined by a special expert committee of the Turkish Grand National Assembly. The Government indicated, in particular, that the Bill had been drawn up in a way to embody a policy of protecting persons conscripted into military service from being assigned duties in public bodies or undertakings without their consent. Noting that no information was provided in the Government’s report as regards the repeal of the amendment of these provisions, the Committee asks the Government to keep the Office informed about the progress in the adoption of the bill, in order to bring legislation into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice.

Article 1(c) and (d). Disciplinary measures applicable to seafarers. In its earlier comments the Committee noted that, under section 1467 of the Commercial Code (Act No. 6762 of 29 June 1956), seafarers may be forcibly conveyed on board ship to perform their duties, and that, under section 1469 of the Commercial Code, various breaches of discipline by seafarers are punishable with imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour). The Committee also noted that the Government had submitted to the Parliament a bill to amend section 1467 of the Commercial Code, which contains a provision limiting the powers of the master to circumstances jeopardizing the safety of the ship or endangering the lives of the passengers and the crew, and expressed the hope that section 1469 of the Commercial Code would likewise be amended to limit its scope to acts endangering the safety of the ship or the lives or health of persons. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the new draft Commercial Code submitted to the Grand National Assembly does not contain the provisions similar to those in sections 1467 and 1469 of the present Commercial Code. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the new Commercial Code will soon be adopted and that the legislation will be brought into conformity with the Convention.

Article 1(d). Punishment for participation in strikes. For a number of years, the Committee has been referring to Act No. 2822 of 1983 regarding collective labour agreements, strikes and lockouts, which provides in sections 70–73, 75, 77 and 79 for penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) as a punishment for the participation in unlawful strikes, in circumstances falling within the scope of Article 1(d) of the Convention. The Committee notes with interest that article 73 of Act No. 2822 has been repealed by Act No. 5728 of 2008. Referring to its comments addressed to the Government under the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Committee expresses the firm hope that Act No. 2822 of 1983 referred to above will be further amended in order to ensure that no penal sanctions involving compulsory labour can be imposed as a punishment for the peaceful participation in strikes.

Uganda

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. 1. Legislation concerning compulsory placement of unemployed persons on agricultural enterprises in rural areas. For a number of years, the Committee has been referring to section 2(1) of the Community Farm Settlement Decree, 1975, under which any unemployed able-bodied person may be settled on any farm settlement and required to render service; section 15 of the Decree makes it an offence punishable with a fine and imprisonment for any person to fail or refuse to live on any farm settlement or to desert or leave such settlement without authorization. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication in its report that the abovementioned Decree was in the process of being repealed under the laws of Uganda revision exercise by the Uganda Law Reform Commission. The Committee has also noted from the statement of the Government representative before the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2006, that the 1975 Decree is a "dead law" which is not applied in practice, and that the current Parliament intends to repeal it. While having noted these indications, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the Community Farm Settlement Decree, 1975, will be repealed in the near future, in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice. It asks the Government to supply a copy of the repealing text, as soon as it is adopted.

2. Freedom of career military officers to leave their service. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that the Armed Forces (Conditions of Service) (Officers) Regulations, 1969, were replaced by the National Resistance Army (Conditions of Service) (Officers) Regulations, No. 6 of 1993 (now the Uganda Peoples' Defence Forces (Conditions of Service) (Officers) Regulations). The Committee has noted that section 28(1) of these Regulations contains a provision (which is similar to a corresponding provision of the repealed Regulations) under which the Board may permit officers to resign their commission in writing at any stage during their service. The Committee has noted the Government's repeated indication in its reports, which was also confirmed by the Government representative in his statement before the Conference Committee in June 2006, that the officer applying for the resignation must give his/her reasons for it, and the Board will consider these reasons and, if it finds them fit, will grant a permission to resign.

The Committee observes that it follows from the wording of section 28(1) that the application to resign may be either accepted or refused. It refers to the explanations provided in paragraphs 46 and 96–97 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, where it pointed out that career military servicemen who have voluntarily entered into an engagement cannot be deprived of the right to leave the service in peacetime within a reasonable period, either at specified intervals, or with previous notice, subject to the conditions which may normally be required to ensure the continuity of the service. The Committee therefore expresses the firm hope that the necessary measures will be taken with a view to amending section 28(1) of the above Regulations, so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention. Pending such amendment, the Committee again requests the Government to provide information on the application of section 28(1) in practice, indicating in particular the criteria applied by the Board in accepting or rejecting a resignation, as well as the number of resignations accepted and refused.

3. Military service of persons enrolled below the age of 18 years. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication in its report that the Armed Forces (Conditions of Service) (Men) Regulations, 1969, which provided that the term of service of persons enrolled below the age of 18 years might be extended until they are 30 years old, was repealed by the National Resistance Army (Conditions of Service) (Men) Regulations No. 7 of 1993. The Government indicated that section 5(4) of these Regulations prohibits a person below the age of 18 years or above 30 years to be employed in the armed forces. While having noted these indications, the Committee again requests the Government to supply a copy of Regulations No. 7, 1993, with its next report.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. For a number of years, the Committee has been referring to the following legislation:

- the Public Order and Security Act, No. 20 of 1967, empowering the executive to restrict an individual's association or communication with others, independently of the commission of any offence and subject to penalties involving compulsory labour;
- sections 54(2)(c), 55, 56 and 56A of the Penal Code, empowering the minister to declare any combination of two or more people an unlawful society and thus render any speech, publication or activity on behalf of, or in support of, such combination illegal and punishable with imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour).

As the Committee repeatedly pointed out, any penal sanctions involving an obligation to perform prison labour are contrary to the Convention when imposed on persons convicted for expressing political views or views opposed to the established political system, or having contravened a widely discretionary administrative decision depriving them of the right to publish their views or suspending or dissolving certain associations (see, for example, paragraphs 152–166 of its General Survey of 2007 on the eradication of forced labour).

The Committee expresses the firm hope that the necessary measures will at last be taken to repeal or amend the abovementioned provisions of the Public Order and Security Act, No. 20 of 1967, and of the Penal Code, in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention, and that the Government will provide, in its next report, information on progress made in this regard.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Uzbekistan

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1997)

Article 1(b) of the Convention. Mobilization and use of labour for purposes of economic development in agriculture (cotton production). In its earlier comments, the Committee noted communications received in 2008 and 2009 from the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), which alleged that, despite the existence of the legal framework against the use of forced labour, there were continued non-governmental organizations denouncing, and media reports recording the systematic and persistent use of forced labour, including forced child labour, in the cotton fields of Uzbekistan. The IOE and the ITUC alleged that the Government systematically mobilized both school-aged children and adults to work in the annual cotton harvest for purposes of economic development. The Committee also noted previously the comments made by the Council of the Trade Unions Federation of Uzbekistan, communicated by the Government with its 2004 report, which contained allegations concerning practices of mobilization and use of labour for purposes of economic development in cotton production, in which public sector workers, school children and university students were involved.

The Committee notes two new communications received in November 2010 from a number of workers' organizations: a communication dated 19 November 2010, received from the European Apparel and Textile Confederation (EURATEX) and the European Trade Union Federation: Textiles, Clothing and Leather (ETUF: TCL); and a communication dated 22 November 2010 received from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), the European Trade Union Confederation (ETUC), the ETUF: TCL, the International Union of Food, Agricultural, Hotel, Restaurant, Catering, Tobacco and Allied Workers' Associations (IUF) and the European Federation of Food, Agriculture and Tourism Trade Unions (EFFAT). Both communications, which relate to the issue of continued use of child labour in the cotton harvest, were sent to the Government, in November 2010, for such comments as it may wish to make on the matters raised therein.

The Committee notes the Government's response to the 2008 and 2009 communications by the IOE and the ITUC, received in January 2010, in which the Government submitted its observations on the alleged cases of widespread use of forced child labour in the cotton industry, including information on the implementation of the national action plan concerning the application of the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), and the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), likewise ratified by Uzbekistan. In so far as Article 3(a) of Convention No. 182 provides that the worst forms of child labour include "all forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery, such as the sale and trafficking of children, debt bondage and serfdom and forced or compulsory labour", the Committee is of the view that this problem can be examined more specifically under Convention No. 182. The protection of children is enhanced by the fact that Convention No. 182 requires States which ratify it to take immediate and effective measures to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. The Committee accordingly asks the Government to refer to its comments on the application of Convention No. 182.

However, the Committee previously noted that, according to the above allegations made by the IOE and the ITUC, adults were also subject to forced labour during the cotton harvest. The ITUC alleged, in particular, that local administration employees, teachers, factory workers and doctors were commonly forced to leave their jobs for weeks at a time and pick cotton with no additional compensation; in some instances refusal to cooperate could lead to dismissal from work; even elderly people and mothers of young babies had been reportedly ordered by local government officials to pick cotton or lose their pensions or child benefits. The ITUC concluded that, even if forced labour in the cotton fields was not the result of state policy, the Government still violated the Convention by failing to ensure its effective observance, since it systematically required persons to work in the cotton fields against their will, under the threat of a penalty and in extremely perilous conditions for the purposes of economic development.

The Committee notes that, in its reply to the above communications by the IOE and the ITUC, received in January 2010, the Government denies the allegations about coercion of large numbers of people to participate in agricultural work and reiterates that, under no circumstances, employers may use compulsory labour for the production or harvesting of agricultural products in Uzbekistan, the exaction of forced labour being punishable with penal and administrative sanctions, and employers being liable for violation of labour legislation. The Government also reiterates its earlier statement that almost all the country's cotton is produced by private undertakings that have no economic interest in employing additional labour.

While noting these indications, the Committee asks the Government to state, in its next report, whether public sector workers and university students participate in the cotton harvest and, if so, how their work is organized, indicating, in particular, the measures taken, including through labour inspection, in order to eliminate any possibility to use compulsory labour in cotton production, so as to ensure the observance of the Convention, which prohibits the use of compulsory labour for purposes of economic development. Please also provide information on the legal proceedings which have been instituted against employers for the exaction of compulsory labour in cotton production under the existing penal and administrative provisions, supplying copies of the relevant court decisions and indicating the penalties imposed.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1964)

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Trafficking in persons. The Committee notes with interest the adoption of the Anti-Human Trafficking Act (No. 11 of 2008), which provides for various measures aiming at combating human trafficking, including prevention and victim protection measures. It notes, in particular, that, under section 3 of the Act, persons found guilty of human trafficking and related crimes are liable to imprisonment for a term of not less than 20 years and up to 30 years and, in certain situations, to imprisonment for life. The Committee also notes the information on the application in practice of the Penal Code provisions criminalizing human trafficking adopted in 2005.

The Committee asks the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the application in practice of the new Anti-Human Trafficking Act (No. 11 of 2008), as regards both victim protection measures (particularly sections 34, 37, 40–47 and 58) and punishment of perpetrators (section 3), supplying sample copies of the relevant court decisions and indicating the penalties imposed.

The Committee notes the Government's brief indications in the report concerning the tasks of the Inter-Ministerial Committee on Human Trafficking, which include, inter alia, coordination of various programmes concerning prevention and protection measures, prosecution of traffickers, as well as development and revision of policies and legislation on human trafficking.

The Committee asks the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the application in practice of the National Plan of Action to combat trafficking, to which reference has been made in the Government's previous report, as well as the information on practical activities of the Inter-Ministerial Committee referred to above, including copies of relevant reports and available statistics. Please also supply a copy of the National Anti-Human Trafficking Policy referred to in the Government's 2008 report.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1998)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for the expression of views opposed to the established political, social or economic system. The Committee previously noted a communication received, in September 2009, from the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions (ZCTU), which contained observations concerning the application of the Convention by Zimbabwe. The ZCTU alleged, inter alia, that national laws (such as the Criminal Law (Codification and Reform) Act) contain provisions restricting freedom of expression in criticizing the President and the police, and that workers, as well as citizens in general, are subjected to harassment if they express views contrary to the State. The Committee has also noted the findings, conclusions and recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry appointed under article 26 of the ILO Constitution to examine the observance by the Government of Zimbabwe of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). It has noted, in particular, the complainants' allegations concerning, among others, the continual recourse made by the Government to the Public Order and Security Act (POSA) and the Criminal Law (Codification and Reform) Act to repress basic civil liberties and trade union rights, as well as the Commission's conclusions, in which the Commission, inter alia, expressed the opinion that the way in which the POSA has been used in practice denies trade unions the right to demonstrate.

In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the following provisions of national legislation, under which penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory prison labour by virtue of section 76(1) of the Prisons Act (Cap. 7:11) and section 66(1) of the Prisons (General) Regulations, 1996) may be imposed in circumstances falling within Article 1(a) of the Convention:

- sections 15, 16, 19(1)(b), (c) and 24–27 of the Public Order and Security Act (POSA) (Cap. 11:17) (publishing or communicating false statements prejudicial to the State; making any false statement about or concerning the President; performing any action, uttering any words or distributing or displaying any writing, sign or other visible representation that is threatening, abusive or insulting, intending thereby to provoke a breach of peace; failure to notify the authority of the intention to hold public gatherings, violation of the prohibition of public gatherings or public demonstrations, etc.);
- sections 31 and 33 of the Criminal Law (Codification and Reform) Act (Chapter 9:23), which contain provisions similar to those of the POSA referred to under the previous point concerning the publishing or communicating false statements prejudicial to the State or making any false statement about or concerning the President, etc.;

- sections 37 and 41 of the Criminal Law (Codification and Reform) Act (Chapter 9:23), under which sanctions of imprisonment may be imposed, inter alia, for participating in meetings and gatherings with the intention of “disturbing the peace, security or order of the public”; uttering any words or distributing or displaying any writing, sign or other visible representation that is threatening, abusive or insulting, “intending thereby to provoke a breach of peace”; engaging in disorderly conduct in public places with similar intention, etc.

The Committee recalls that Article 1(a) of the Convention prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labour as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. It also refers in this connection to paragraph 154 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, where it observed that the Convention does not prohibit punishment by penalties involving compulsory labour of persons who use violence, incite violence or engage in preparatory acts aimed at violence. But sanctions involving compulsory labour are incompatible with the Convention if they enforce a prohibition of the peaceful expression of non-violent views that are critical of Government policy and the established political system, whether the prohibition is imposed by law or by an administrative decision. Since opinions and views opposed to the established system may be expressed not only through the press or other communications media, but also at various kinds of meetings and assemblies, if such meetings and assemblies are subject to prior authorization granted at the discretion of the authorities and violations can be punished by sanctions involving compulsory labour, such provisions also come within the scope of the Convention (see, for example, the explanations in paragraph 162 of the General Survey referred to above).

While taking due note of the Government’s statement that courts of law merely impose a prison term and the suitability of an offender to perform labour is determined by the prison authorities, the Committee recalls that the Convention prohibits the use of “any form” of forced or compulsory labour, including compulsory prison labour, as a punishment in respect of the persons covered by Article 1(a).

The Committee therefore expresses the firm hope that the necessary measures will be taken in order to repeal or amend the provisions of the Public Order and Security Act and the Criminal Law (Codification and Reform) Act, in order to bring legislation into conformity with the Convention. Pending the adoption of such measures, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application of these provisions in practice, supplying copies of the court decisions and indicating the penalties imposed.

Article 1(d). Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for having participated in strikes. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to certain provisions of the Labour Act punishing persons engaged in an unlawful collective action with sanctions of imprisonment, which involves compulsory prison labour by virtue of section 76(1) of the Prisons Act (Cap. 7:11) and section 66(1) of the Prisons (General) Regulations, 1996. The Committee noted, in particular, that section 104(2), and (3) of the Labour Act, as amended, not only prohibits collective job action in essential services and in the case of the agreement of the parties to refer the dispute to arbitration, but also provides for other restrictions on the right to collective job action related to procedural requirements, which are equally enforceable with sanctions of imprisonment (involving compulsory prison labour), under sections 109(1), (2) and 112(1) of the Act. Besides, it follows from the wording of section 102(b) of the Act that the Minister can declare essential any service, other than that interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population.

The Committee recalls that Article 1(d) of the Convention prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labour as a punishment for having participated in strikes. It also notes that, in its conclusions referred to above, the Commission of Inquiry expressed concern that the legislation includes disproportionate sanctions for the exercise of the right to strike and an excessively large definition of essential services, which means that a significant number of workers has no right to strike.

The Committee notes the Government’s statement in its report that, in the context of labour law reform, consideration is being made for the review of section 109 of the Labour Act in so far as reference is made to penalties for engaging in unlawful collective job action.

The Committee trusts that the necessary measures will soon be taken to amend the provisions of the Labour Act imposing restrictions on the right to strike enforceable with sanctions involving compulsory prison labour, so as to ensure that no such sanctions can be imposed for the mere fact of organizing or participating in strikes, in order to bring legislation into conformity with the Convention. It asks the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the progress made in this regard.

The Committee noted the information supplied by the following State in answer to a direct request with regard to: Convention No. 29 (Slovakia).

Elimination of child labour and protection of children and young persons

Albania

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1998)

Article 2(1) of the Convention. Scope of application. Self-employed children or children working in the informal sector. The Committee previously noted that section 3(1) of the Labour Code specifies that the Code is applicable to an employment contract, which is defined as an agreement regulating the work relations between employers and employees. It therefore observed that the Labour Code appeared to exclude children engaged in work outside of an employment agreement, such as self-employed children or those working in the informal sector.

The Committee notes the information in the Government's report submitted under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), that 13.3 per cent of children identified during labour inspections conducted by the State Labour Inspectorate did not have an individual work contract. It also notes the statement in the Government's National Child Strategy of 2005 that child labour mostly occurs in the informal sector, in work such as street vending and windshield washing. The Committee further notes the statement in the report of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), for the World Trade Organization General Council on the Trade Policies of Albania of 28 and 30 April 2010, entitled "Internationally recognized core labour standards in Albania" (ITUC Report) that labour inspectors generally investigate only the formal labour sector, although most child labour occurs in informal economic activities. The Committee reminds the Government that the Convention applies to all sectors of economic activity and covers all forms of employment or work, whether or not there is an employment contract or the work is carried out on a self-employed basis. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the protection afforded by the Convention is granted to children carrying out economic activities without an employment agreement, including self-employed children and children working in the informal economy, as soon as possible. In this regard, the Committee encourages the Government to take measures to adapt and strengthen the State Labour Inspectorate to improve the capacity of labour inspectors to identify cases of child labour in the informal sector.

Article 3(3). Authorization to work from the age of 16 years. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes with satisfaction that pursuant to section 100 of the Labour Code (as amended in 2003), only persons over 18 years of age may be employed to carry out difficult jobs or jobs that pose danger for their health or personality.

Article 6. Apprenticeship and vocational training. The Committee previously noted that, in accordance with section 98(2) of the Labour Code, young persons under the age of 14 years engaged in vocational training activities or orientation are subject to rules defined by decree. It also noted that, according to section 3 of Decree No. 384, as amended by Decree No. 205 of 2002, minors under 14 years of age may be engaged in the vocational training system under authorization of the State Labour Inspectorate. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the minimum age for entering an apprenticeship programme.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that in technical schools, practical internships are part of the professional qualification programme. The Committee observes that, as minors under 14 years may be engaged in vocational training, it appears that these children may be authorized to undertake practical internships. Recalling that Article 6 of the Convention authorizes work to be carried out by persons aged at least 14 years in enterprises within the context of an apprenticeship programme, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that only persons from the age of 14 are permitted to undertake practical internships in enterprises.

Article 7(3). Determination of types of light work. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes that section 98(1) of the Labour Code (as amended in 2003) states that juveniles between the ages of 14–16 may be employed during their school holidays, provided that this employment does not harm their health and development. The Committee also notes the Government's statement that no regulations have been issued pursuant to this section. In this regard, the Committee reminds the Government that, pursuant to Article 7(3) of the Convention, the competent authority shall determine the activities which constitute light work and shall prescribe the number of hours during which and the conditions in which such employment or work may be undertaken. The Committee accordingly requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the determination of the types of activities which constitute permissible school holiday work for persons between the ages of 14–16, in addition to number of hours during which and the conditions in which such employment may be undertaken. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard, with its next report.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee previously noted that a national survey on child labour was under preparation, and requested a copy of this national survey. The Committee notes the Government's statement in its report submitted under Convention No. 182, that in February 2010, implementation began of a national survey on child labour by INSTAT (the Government's institute for statistics), in cooperation with ILO-IPEC. In this regard, the Committee notes the information in an ILO-IPEC Technical Progress Report for the project entitled "Upstream activities for the prevention and elimination of the worst forms of child labour in Central and Eastern Europe” of February 2010 that this survey will be completed by May 2011, and will include both quantitative and qualitative data on the labour market and child activities. The Committee also notes the information in the Government’s report that, during the reporting period, 7,123 enterprises were inspected and 503 working children under the age of 18 identified, 457 of whom were in the production sector. The Government also indicates that the State Labour Inspectorate fined six enterprises for violations of provisions in the Labour Code related to the employment of children.

Nonetheless, the Committee notes the statement in the ITUC Report that child labour is a severe and deep-rooted problem in Albania. The ITUC Report indicates a large number of children work in extremely hazardous occupations and under dangerous conditions in the following sectors: agriculture, construction, small shoe and clothing factories and the service sector. The ITUC Report also states that the majority of child labourers work as street or shop vendors, farmers or shepherds, textile factory workers, miners, shoeshine boys, in small trade and services, transport, or street construction, and that the Construction Workers’ Trade Union reports that 20 per cent of construction workers are less than 16 years of age. The ITUC Report further indicates that children working in these sectors are exposed to chemicals, carrying heavy loads, exhaustion owing to long working hours, injuries from tools, and denial of access to schooling and social activities necessary for proper growth and development. Lastly, the ITUC Report indicates that these children were employed both as permanent workers and as seasonal or day workers, and refers to figures from Education International estimating that 50,000 children work part time or full time in Albania. Therefore, while noting the efforts made by the Government to combat child labour, the Committee expresses its concern at reports of a large number of working children in the country, as well as the significant number of children engaged in hazardous occupations. The Committee accordingly requests the Government to strengthen its efforts to address the problem of child labour in the country, in continued collaboration with ILO-IPEC. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the concrete measures taken in this regard, and on the results achieved. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to provide information from the national survey on child labour, once completed, particularly on the number of working children under the minimum age of 16.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee observed that although the trafficking of children for labour or sexual exploitation was prohibited by law, it remained an issue of concern in practice. It noted the information from the Confederation of Trade Unions of Albania that children were victims of trafficking. The Report of the UN Special Rapporteur on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography of 27 March 2006 indicated that since 2001 Albania had emerged as a source country for victims of trafficking (for the purposes of both sexual and labour exploitation), though initiatives had resulted in a decline in child trafficking for labour exploitation (E/CN.4/2006/67/Add.2, paragraphs 10 and 15). It noted the adoption of the Strategy and Plan of Action for the Fight Against Child Trafficking and the Protection of Child Victims of Trafficking for the period 2005–07, and requested information on the impact of the various measures taken within this framework.

The Committee notes the Government’s statement that the implementation of the National Anti-Trafficking Strategy 2008–10 has proceeded according to the timelines envisioned in the action plans. The Government indicates that the National Anti-Trafficking Strategy 2008–10 focuses on four main aspects: prosecution of traffickers, protection and assistance for victims, prevention and coordination. The Government’s report also indicates that law enforcement agencies have continued the successful investigation of trafficking offences, and that cooperation between the Prosecutor’s office and the police continues, including the exchange of statistical data. In this regard, the Government indicates that the Database on Victims of Trafficking is being improved to ensure detailed reporting on the identified, protected and reintegrated victims of trafficking. The Committee also notes the various measures implemented to prevent child trafficking, including the organization of an awareness-raising campaign aimed at children between 7–14 years, and the facilitation of birth registration of children. The Committee further notes the information in the Government’s report that Regional Anti-Trafficking Committees within the country have met regularly, with activities including awareness raising among women and girls, identifying vulnerable social groups, identifying cases of trafficking, reporting on the number of children who have dropped out of school and supporting civil society organizations engaged in combating trafficking.

While taking due note of these measures, the Committee notes the statement in the report of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), for the World Trade Organization General Council on the Trade Policies of Albania of 28 and 30 April 2010, entitled “Internationally recognized core labour standards in Albania” (ITUC Report) that the trafficking of children for labour or sexual exploitation remains a problem in the country, and that the Government should strengthen its prosecution of traffickers. The ITUC Report indicates that the prevalence of child trafficking results from poverty, economic instability, housing problems, poor living conditions, low levels of education, low employment opportunities, and improper and ineffective law enforcement. In this regard, the Committee expresses its concern at the continued prevalence of the trafficking of children under 18 years of age in Albania. It accordingly urges the Government to strengthen its efforts, within the framework of the National Anti-Trafficking Strategy 2008–10, to combat the trafficking of persons under 18 years of age, and to ensure that thorough investigations and robust prosecutions of persons who commit this offence are carried out and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions are imposed in practice. It requests the Government to provide information on the impact of measures taken in this regard, particularly with respect to the number of prosecutions, convictions and the sentences imposed for the trafficking of children. It also requests the Government to continue to provide any additional information on the trafficking of persons under 18 years of age from the Database on Victims of Trafficking.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration. Trafficking. The Committee previously noted that the National Strategy and Plan of Action against Child Trafficking contained various measures to protect, rehabilitate and reintegrate child victims of trafficking. It requested the Government to provide information on the number of children reached through this Strategy. The Committee notes the Government's statement that in 2009, 22 child victims of trafficking were offered services in public and private residential centres. The Committee also notes the information in the Government's report that pursuant to amendments to the Law on Social Assistance and Services (No. 9335) of 2 March 2010, victims of trafficking will benefit from economic assistance after they leave residential centres. The Government also indicates that municipal economic assistance offices and protection units provide referrals and assistance to persons at risk and trafficked persons. The Committee further notes the information in the Government's report that the Guideline of the Minister of Labour No. 316 of 10 February 2010 "On the implementation of standards of social care services for trafficked or at-risk persons" aims to standardize the practice and documentation of every institution providing services to victims of trafficking. The Government indicates that it has taken measures to improve the vocational education curriculum, providing free vocational training to 38 victims of trafficking (both girls and women) and that 92 victims of trafficking were employed and reintegrated. Lastly, the Committee notes the information in the Government's report that the National Reception Centre for Victims of Trafficking offers reception, accommodation, rehabilitation, referral for reintegration and repatriation to Albanian and foreign women and girls, as well as children who are at the risk of being trafficked. This Reception Centre is high security, and provides medical, legal and educational services, as well as psychosocial counselling for children.

Clause (d). Identifying and reaching out to children at special risk. Street children and children from minority groups. The Committee previously noted the ITUC's allegations that significant numbers of Albanian boys and girls are engaged in begging, starting as early as 4 or 5 years, and that most children involved are from the Roma or Egyptian communities. The ITUC also urged the Government to assist children who work on the streets to overcome barriers to education and help them re-enter the school system and to introduce and support programmes to reduce the poverty and inequality faced by Roma and Egyptian communities. It also noted the information in the Report of the UN Special Rapporteur that the most visible form of child labour in Albania is street work, though it noted that one of the target groups of the Strategic Framework for Action on Child Labour is children who work on the streets. It requested the Government to provide information on the number of children found working on the streets and then rehabilitated and integrated as a result of the measures taken.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that the major issues with regard to the Roma community are low levels of education (with high illiteracy and low numbers of pupils enrolled), poor living conditions, poverty, and high levels of trafficking and prostitution. The Government indicates that it is implementing a ten-year National Strategy for the Improvement of the Living Conditions of the Roma Minority, adopted in 2003 (National Strategy on Roma 2003), which seeks to address, inter alia, education, poverty reduction and social protection. The Government indicates that this has resulted in an increase in attendance in schools by Roma children. However, the possibility of teaching the Roma language in schools has not yet been fully implemented. The Government also indicates that it organizes summer schools with Roma and non-Roma children, and that Roma children have benefited from measures to increase access to education for children from poor families. The Government further indicates that the Ministry of Interior has undertaken a campaign for the protection of children and their removal from the streets. Nonetheless, the Committee notes the Government's statement that, despite some successful initiatives, the implementation of the National Strategy on Roma 2003 has been poor, and the Strategy's objectives have not been successfully transmitted to local level institutions. However, the Committee notes that the Government acceded to the Roma Inclusion Decade in 2008 and that a National Action Plan for the implementation of the Roma Inclusion Decade was adopted on 28 October 2009. The Committee also notes the information in the ILO-IPEC Technical Progress Report for the project entitled "Upstream activities for prevention and elimination of the worst forms of child labour in Central and Eastern Europe" of February 2010 (ILO-IPEC TPR 2010) that an action project entitled "Classes for alternative education and vocational training" was launched in 2009, and will continue until 2012. This action project targets children between 10–16 years of age from Roma and Egyptian communities in Elbasan, Berat and Korca, who are involved or at risk of trafficking and street work. It also notes the information in the ILO-IPEC TPR 2010 that the action programme entitled "Integrated programme on the elimination of the worst forms of child labour", implemented in 2009, resulted in the withdrawal of 99 boys and 43 girls from work on the streets.

While noting the various measures undertaken by the Government, the Committee observes that Roma children remain at an increased risk of being engaged in the worst forms of child labour. The Committee therefore requests the Government to strengthen its efforts, within the framework of the new National Action Plan for the Roma Inclusion Decade, to ensure the protection of Roma children against worst forms of child labour, particularly trafficking, forced begging and work on the streets. It requests the Government to provide information on the effective and time-bound measures taken in this regard, and on the results achieved.

Article 8. International cooperation. Trafficking. The Committee previously noted that the National Strategy and Plan of Action against Child Trafficking included several measures to cooperate at the international level in order to prevent child trafficking. It requested information on the impact of these measures.

The Committee notes the information in the Government's report that it participates in a Transnational Referral Mechanism, which is a cooperation agreement between countries of the region with respect to cross-border transfer and care of victims of trafficking. This Mechanism facilitates cross-border cooperation and dialogue, for the rapid exchange of information regarding the identification, investigation and return of victims. The Committee also notes the information in the Government's report that it is working with the International Organization on Migration to draft standard operational procedure for the clear division of obligations of parties for the improvement of the functioning of the National Referral Mechanism, and that cooperation with the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe has resulted in the provision of training to Regional Anti-Trafficking Committees. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that it has signed an agreement with the Government of Greece on the return, rehabilitation and care for trafficked children. The Committee requests the Government to pursue its international cooperation efforts to combat inter-state trafficking of persons under 18. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken in this regard, and on the results achieved.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Angola

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Sale and trafficking of children. The Committee previously noted the indication of the National Union of Angolan Workers (UNTA) that cases of child trafficking existed in the country. It also noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC) expressed concern about the extent of the problem of sexual exploitation and trafficking of children. The Committee further noted that, although Angolan law criminalizes kidnapping, forced labour and bonded servitude, it does not prohibit trafficking in persons, including children. In this regard, the Committee noted that section 183 of the draft Penal Code (finalized in 2006) prohibited recruiting or receiving persons under 18 for the exercise of prostitution in a foreign country. The Committee observed that while the draft Penal Code prohibited some types of child trafficking, it did not prohibit the sale and trafficking of children for labour exploitation, nor internal trafficking.

The Committee notes that article 12 of the new Constitution of Angola (2010) states that the Government shall respect and implement the principles of the UN Charter on the basis of, inter alia, repudiating human trafficking. However, the Committee observes, that article 12 does not specifically prohibit and penalize human trafficking. The Committee notes the Government's statement in its report to the CRC of 26 February 2010 that trafficking is not defined in national legislation, and that the prevention and mitigation of the phenomenon requires, inter alia, legislative reform (CRC/C/AGO/2-4 paragraph 175). The Committee further notes the Government's statement in its reply to the list of issues of the CRC of 24 August 2010 that the draft Penal Code has been submitted to Parliament for discussion and approval (CRC/C/AGO/Q/2-4/Add.1, paragraphs 60 and 61). The Committee notes an absence of information in the Government's report as to whether this draft Penal Code has been modified to include internal trafficking or trafficking of children for the purpose of labour exploitation.

In this regard, the Committee notes the statement in a report on the worst forms of child labour in Angola of 10 September 2009, available on the website of the Office of the High Commissioner for Refugees (www.unhcr.org) (WFCL Report), that children are trafficked internally for the purpose of sexual exploitation and labour exploitation (in agriculture and domestic service). The Committee also notes the information in a report on trafficking in persons in Angola of 14 June 2010, also available on the website of the Office of the High Commissioner for Refugees (Trafficking Report), that women and children more often become victims of internal rather than transnational sex trafficking. Therefore, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that provisions prohibiting both the internal trafficking of children under 18 years and their sale and trafficking for the purpose of labour exploitation are included in national legislation, and to establish penalties in this regard, as a matter of urgency.

Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of a child for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances. The Committee previously noted that section 184(1) of the draft Penal Code prohibits anyone from promoting, facilitating, permitting, using or offering a young person under 16 years of age for, among other things, pornographic photography, films or engravings. It reminded the Government that, by virtue of Article 3(b) of the Convention, each Member which ratifies the Convention shall prohibit the use, procuring or offering of a child under 18 years of age for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances.

The Committee notes an absence of information on this point in the Government's report. However, the Committee notes that the draft Penal Code is still under discussion by Parliament. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the forthcoming Penal Code includes a prohibition on using, procuring or offering of all persons under 18 years of age for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances, in conformity with Article 3(b) of the Convention. It requests the Government to provide a copy of the amended Penal Code, once adopted.

Article 4(1). Determination of hazardous types of employment or work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that Decree No. 58/82, which contained a comprehensive list of hazardous types of work prohibited for children under 18 years of age, was repealed by the General Labour Act of 2000 (Act No. 2/00). The Committee observed that while section 284(1) of Act No. 2/00 prohibits the employment of minors in hazardous work, pursuant to section 284(2), this prohibition only includes employment in theatres, cinemas, nightclubs, cabarets, discotheques and other similar establishments, or as traders or in publicity for pharmaceutical products.

The Committee observes that the prohibition of hazardous work for minors in section 284(2) of Act No. 2/00 appears to encompass only types of work which may harm the morals of children, and does not address types of work which may harm their health or safety. In this regard, the Committee once again reminds the Government that pursuant to Article 4(1) of the Convention, the types of work which, by their nature or the circumstances in which they are carried out, are likely to harm the health, safety or morals of children, shall be determined by national laws or regulations or by the competent authority, after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned. With regard to types of work that may be harmful to the health and safety of children, the Committee notes the Government's statement in its report to the CRC of 26 February 2010 identifying cases of children engaged in hazardous activities and exploitative work such as work in high-seas fishing in the Namibe province, in diamond mines, in border localities, in markets and in bus terminals (CRC/C/AGO/2-4, paragraph 432). Moreover, the Committee notes the information in the WFCL Report that children working in agriculture in Benguela are known to apply chemicals, use machinery and dangerous tools, and carry heavy loads. The Committee draws the Government's attention to Paragraph 3 of the Worst Forms of Child Labour Recommendation, 1999 (No. 190), which provides that in determining the types of hazardous work prohibited to minors, consideration should be given, inter alia, to: (a) work which exposes children to physical, psychological or sexual abuse; (b) work underground, underwater, at dangerous heights or in confined spaces; (c) work with dangerous machinery, equipment and tools, or which involves the manual handling or transport of heavy loads; (d) work in unhealthy environments which may, for example, expose children to hazardous substances, agents or processes, or to temperatures, noise levels, or vibrations damaging to their health; and (e) work under particularly difficult conditions such as work for long hours or during the night or work where the child is unreasonably confined to the premises of the employer. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the determination of the types of hazardous work prohibited to minors includes not only a prohibition against types of work that are harmful to a child's morals, but also a prohibition against types of work that are harmful to their health and safety, in conformity with Article 4(1) of the Convention. It hopes that, in this regard, the Government will take into consideration the types of work enumerated in Paragraph 3 of Recommendation No. 190.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. Labour inspection. The Committee previously noted the UNTA's indication that cases of children working in the informal sector had been reported. It also noted, in its comments under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), that most working minors are engaged in the informal economy.

The Committee notes the Government's statement, in its communication of 2 June 2009 regarding the comments of the UNTA, that efforts to monitor the informal sector are being made by the labour inspectorate and that provincial monitoring units are also involved in monitoring this sector. The Government further indicates that, despite efforts towards the formalization of this sector, the informal sector will not disappear any time soon. The Committee also notes the statement in the WFCL Report that the Government does not have the capacity to regulate the informal sector, where the majority of children work and where most labour law violations occur. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to strengthen and adapt the capacity of the labour inspection and provincial monitoring units to improve the monitoring of children working in the informal economy. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this respect with regard to combating the worst forms of child labour in the informal sector, and on the results achieved.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (a). Prevent the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour. Access to free basic education. The Committee previously noted the ILO-IPEC information that close to 44 per cent of all children in Angola do not attend school. It also noted that Angola was implementing, in collaboration with UNESCO, a National Plan of Action for Education for All (2001–15) (NPA EFA) and that measures had been taken within the framework of the reform of the education system.

The Committee notes the Government's statement in its reply to the list of issues of the CRC of 24 August 2010 that the Ministry of Education has developed a series of actions for the mid-term assessment of the NPA EFA (CRC/C/AGO/Q/2-4/Add.1, paragraph 35). The Committee also notes the Government's indication in its report to the CRC of 26 February 2010 that it has begun implementation of a literacy and catch-up strategy (2006–15), in partnership with UNICEF, which seeks to accelerate learning with the use of self-teaching and the certification of skills acquired in various contexts of formal and informal education (CRC/C/AGO/2-4, paragraph 354). The Government also indicates that the number of students attending primary school rose between 2004 and 2006, although, due to the lasting effects of armed conflict, the growth was higher in the inland provinces than in the coastal provinces, and that the gender disparity in enrolment rates persisted (CRC/C/AGO/2-4, paragraphs 338 and 339). The Government further indicates in this report that there are high student failure and drop-out rates in the country, and that due to familial poverty, only 37.2 per cent of all children who start the first grade will finish the sixth grade (CRC/C/AGO/2-4, paragraph 344).

In this regard, the Committee notes that the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (CESCR), in its concluding observations of 1 December 2008, expressed its concern at the limited access to education for groups such as children from rural areas and poor families and girls. The CESCR also expressed its concern that budgetary allocations were not sufficient to meet the rising number of children of school age, and the lack of schools and trained teachers, particularly in remote areas and in slums settlements (E/C.12/AGO/CO/3, paragraphs 38 and 39). Considering that education contributes to preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour, the Committee expresses its concern that children from several vulnerable groups are less likely to attend and complete school. The Committee requests the Government to redouble its efforts, within the framework of the NPA EFA, to strengthen the functioning of the education system and to facilitate access to free basic education, particularly for children in remote areas and conflict affected regions, in addition, to children from poor families, rural areas and girls. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the outcome of the assessment of the NPA EFA, and the subsequent measures taken to strengthen this plan. Lastly, the Committee encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to provide informal educational opportunities and vocational training to children who are not enrolled in formal schooling.

Clause (b). Removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and their rehabilitation and social integration. Child victims of trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication in its report to the CRC in August 2004 (CRC/C/3/Add.66, paragraph 250) that the abduction of children began during the armed conflict and with the end of the conflict, a child protection programme was introduced whereby thousands of children were taken into hostels and camps for displaced persons and refugees, particularly girls who had been victims of sexual exploitation or slavery. The Committee also noted the ILO-IPEC information that the sexual and economic abuse of girls and boys, including the trafficking of children in certain parts of the country, had emerged as a problem. In this regard, the Committee noted that the Government had formulated the National Plan of Action and Intervention against the Sexual and Commercial Exploitation of Children (NPAI SCEC), which included the objectives of protecting and defending the rights of child victims of sexual and commercial exploitation and rehabilitating and preventing the social exclusion of these child victims.

The Committee notes the Government's statement in its report to the CRC of 26 February 2010 that the NPAI SCEC has not been implemented with the required efficiency (CRC/C/AGO/2-4, paragraph 189). The Government indicates in this report that the NPAI SCEC proved unsuitable for the current context, and that there is an urgent need to revise it (CRC/C/AGO/2-4, paragraph 432). The Government indicates that the National Childs Council (INAC) is in the process of evaluating the NPAI SCEC's implementation, with the goal of strengthening the strategy (CRC/C/AGO/2-4, paragraphs 432 and 412).

The Committee also notes the information in the Trafficking Report that while the Government mainly relies upon religious, civil society, and international organizations to protect and assist victims of trafficking, there has been an increase in the number of victims referred to these services by the Government. This report further indicates that, in partnership with UNICEF, the INAC operates 18 child protection networks, which serve as crisis centres for victims of trafficking and other crimes who are between the ages of 9 and 16, and that victims over 16 are referred to shelters run by the Organization of Angolan Women. Nonetheless, the Committee notes the information in the Trafficking Report that law enforcement, immigration and social services personnel do not have a formal system of proactively identifying victims of trafficking among high-risk persons with whom they come in contact. The Committee strongly requests the Government to take immediate measures to revise and strengthen the NPAI SCEC to ensure its effective implementation, with child participation, particularly with regard to initiatives targeting child victims of commercial sexual exploitation. The Committee also urges the Government to redouble its efforts with regard to identifying child victims of trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation, and to ensure that identified victims are referred to appropriate services for their rehabilitation and social reintegration. It requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved.

Clause (d). Identification of children at special risk. 1. Former child soldiers and children displaced as a result of the conflicts. The Committee previously noted that the CRC expressed deep concern that inadequate attention was being given to the plight of former child soldiers, particularly girls. The Committee also noted that the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Children and Armed Conflict expressed concern over the large numbers and appalling conditions of internally displaced children. It noted the ILO-IPEC information that over 100,000 children were separated from their families as a result of war. In this regard, it noted that the Government had implemented a programme for the reintegration of demobilized minors in eight provinces and that the Government adopted the Post-war Child Protection Strategy (PWCP), which was implemented from 2002 to 2006.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its reply to the list of issues of the CRC of 24 August 2010 that, following the end of the war in 2002, the return and reintegration of people directly affected by the conflict (including displaced children and former soldiers) was a priority for the Government. The Government indicates that there were approximately 4 million displaced persons, of which 40 per cent were children (CRC/C/AGO/Q/2-4/Add.1, paragraph 38). The Government also indicates in its report to the CRC of 26 February 2010 that it is implementing a programme to return and resettle the displaced populations, refugees and other persons directly affected by the armed conflict, with special attention to children. The Government's report to the CRC also indicates that the Cabinda provincial government carried out a series of programmes to provide special services to children in the context of reintegrating the vulnerable groups directly affected by the armed conflict. This project to support the reintegration of vulnerable groups includes a training package in various vocational skills (such as cooking, sewing and embroidery), life skills based on micro-lending, child protection and primary health care (CRC/C/AGO/2-4, paragraphs 368 and 369).

The Committee notes the statement in the WFCL Report that children living in provinces most affected by the civil war are more likely to work than children in less-affected provinces. The Committee requests the Government to strengthen its efforts with regard to rehabilitating and reintegrating children affected by the conflict, including former child soldiers. It requests the Government to provide information on the number of children reached through the measures taken in this regard.

2. Street children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's indication that the displacement of a large number of people during the armed conflict gave rise to the phenomenon of street children. The Committee also noted that the Government had set up hostels with the aim of getting these children off the streets, in addition to plans to build 600 regional reception centres for children in need of protection. However, the Committee noted a report indicating that at least 10,000 children work on the streets in the capital city of Luanda, and noted the Government's indication that street children are also found in other large cities, such as Benguela, Lobito, Lubango and Malang.

The Committee notes the Government's statement in its report to the CRC of 26 February 2010 that there has been a decrease in the number of children living on the street due to the relative improvement in the lives of the citizens, but that there remains a significant number of street children (CRC/C/AGO/2-4, paragraph 397). The Committee also notes the Government's indication in this report that efforts are made to reintegrate street children into their biological families, or to place them in foster families. This is done through the Family Tracing and Reunification Programme, which provides support to separated children in temporary institutions and reunites children with their families. The Government also indicates that while the factors contributing to the phenomenon of street children have not been eliminated, 1,545 street children have been picked up and hosted in Casa Pia de Luanda (a children's home), in an effort to reintegrate these children with their families. The Government further indicates that cooperation is ongoing between different governmental partners to implement programmes to develop and upgrade the private institutions in which street children are sheltered (including the provision of integrated education and vocational training programmes) (CRC/C/AGO/2-4, paragraphs 398–401).

The Committee further notes the Government's indication in its reply to the list of issues of the CRC of 24 August 2010 that some children working and living in the street were provided with social reintegration services: 239 street children in 2007, 240 such children in 2008 and 260 such children in 2009. Almost all of these children were boys (CRC/C/AGO/Q/2-4/Add.1, page 14). Lastly, the Committee notes the information in the WFCL Report that the Government continues to implement a project funded by the Government of St. Kitts and Nevis to prevent child labour among street children in Benguela and Lobito. Recalling that street children are particularly vulnerable to the worst forms of child labour, the Committee requests the Government to redouble its efforts to protect street children from these worst forms, and to provide for their rehabilitation and reintegration. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the number of street child who have been provided with educational and vocational training opportunities in children's institutions.

3. Child orphans of HIV/AIDS and other vulnerable children (OVCs). Following its previous comments, the Committee notes the information in the Government's report to the CRC of 26 February 2010 that the number of OVCs could reach approximately 200,000 by 2010 and that the number of OVCs in Angola is rising (CRC/C/AGO/2-4, paragraphs 263–264). The Government also indicates in this report that it began preparing, in 2007, a National Action Plan for OVCs due to HIV/AIDS, which includes strengthening family, community and institutional capacity to respond to the needs of OVCs, and an expansion of services and social protection mechanisms for these children (CRC/C/AGO/2-4, paragraphs 261 and 374). The Government further indicates that the number of survival grants given to OVCs is rising (CRC/C/AGO/2-4, paragraph 50). However, the Committee notes the Government's indication in its Country Progress Report to UNGASS of March 2010 that only 16.8 per cent of households with OVCs receive basic external support. The Committee recalls that OVCs are at an increased risk of being engaged in the worst forms of child labour and therefore urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures, within the framework of the National Action Plan for OVCs due to HIV/AIDS, to ensure that children orphaned by HIV/AIDS and other vulnerable children are protected from these worst forms. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the concrete measures taken in this regard, and on the results achieved, particularly with regard to the percentage of households with OVCs receiving support services and grants.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's statement in its report to the CRC of 26 February 2010 that children in Angola are involved in the worst forms of child labour, particularly in hazardous work (diamond mining and fishing), street labour and commercial sexual exploitation (CRC/C/AGO/2-4, paragraph 432). The Committee also notes the Government's information on this report that 20 child victims of trafficking were identified by law enforcement officials in 2007 and that there have been clear cases of child trafficking in the Zaire Province. The Government states in this report that child trafficking is difficult to control due to the vast border and that Angolan children are taken from the capital city of the country and brought to the DRC and that Congolese children are trafficked from Kinshasa into Angola (paragraphs 172–175). The Committee further notes the indication in the Trafficking Report that the use of children for the purpose of illicit activities is also present in the country, as children are forced to act as couriers in illegal cross-border trade between Namibia and Angola as part of a scheme to skirt import fees. While noting the difficult situation prevailing in the country, the Committee expresses its deep concern at the situation of persons under the age of 18 working in the worst forms of child labour, and accordingly urges the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure in practice the protection of children from these worst forms, particularly trafficking, commercial sexual exploitation, use in illicit activities and hazardous work. It also requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that sufficient data on these worst forms of child labour are available, and to provide information with its next report on the nature, extent and trends of the worst forms of child labour, the number of children covered by the measures giving effect to the Convention, the number and nature of infringements, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and sanctions. To the extent possible, all information provided should be disaggregated by sex and age.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Antigua and Barbuda

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1983)

Article 2(1) and (3) of the Convention. Minimum age for admission to employment and age of completion of compulsory schooling. In its previous comments, the Committee drew the Government's attention to the fact that the provisions of the national legislation respecting the minimum age for admission to employment or work were not in conformity with the age specified by the Government when ratifying the Convention. Indeed, although the Government had specified the minimum age of 16 years when ratifying the Convention, section E3 of the Labour Code provides that no child shall be employed or shall work in a public or private agricultural or industrial undertaking or in any branch thereof, or on any ship, while the term "child", by virtue of section E2 of the Labour Code, means a person under the age of 14 years. The Committee had noted on several occasions that amendments to the Labour Code were under examination with a view to bringing the minimum age for admission to employment or work into conformity with the minimum age specified when ratifying the Convention and with the compulsory school-leaving age which, under section 43(1) of the Education Act of 1973, is 16 years of age. The Committee notes in the Government latest report that a draft of the Labour Code is being circulated, where section E2 of the Labour Code has been amended to fall in line with the minimum age as specified upon ratification. Observing that the Convention was ratified by Antigua and Barbuda more than 25 years ago, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the adoption of the draft Labour Code, whose section E2 has been amended to define a child as a person under the age of 16, which would bring the minimum age for admission to employment or work in the national legislation in conformity with the minimum age specified upon ratification. It requests the Government to provide a copy thereof once it has been adopted.

Article 3(1) and (2). Minimum age for admission to hazardous work and determination of these types of work. The Committee notes from the Government's current report that consultations were held with the unions and employer's federation regarding the activities and occupations to be prohibited to persons below 18 years. The Committee notes that though a recommendation was made, it was not taken before the National Labour Board, as it is the Government's aim to revamp the occupational health and safety legislation. The Committee reminds the Government that Article 3(1) of the Convention provides that the minimum age for admission to any type of employment or work, which by its nature or the circumstances in which it is carried out is likely to jeopardize the health, safety or morals of young persons, shall not be less than 18 years. It also reminds the Government that, under the terms of Article 3(2) of the Convention, the types of hazardous employment or work shall be determined by national laws or regulations or by the competent authority, after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned. The Committee requests the Government to provide information regarding the progress made towards amending the occupational health and safety legislation, which would contain a list of activities and occupations to be prohibited to persons below 18 years of age, in accordance with Article 3(1) and (2) of the Convention. It also requests the Government to provide a copy of the amendments to the occupational health and safety legislation once they have been adopted.

Article 4(2). Exclusion of limited categories of employment or work. The Committee had previously noted that section E3 of the Labour Code provides that the prohibition upon the employment or work of children, that is persons under the age of 14 years (section E2), does not apply to any undertaking or ship on which only members of the same family are employed, to members of a recognized youth organization who are engaged collectively in such employment for the purposes of fund raising for such an organization, nor to a child who is working together with adult members of his/her family on the same work and at the same time and place. Noting that the Government's report does not contain any information on this subject, the Committee urges the Government to indicate in future reports any changes in law and practice in respect of these excluded categories.

The Committee invites the Government to consider seeking technical assistance from the ILO.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2011.]

Argentina

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1996)

Article 2(2) and (5) of the Convention. Raising the minimum age for admission to employment or work. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes with satisfaction the Government's indication in a statement to the Director-General dated 25 May 2010 that it is officially raising the minimum age for admission to employment or work from 15 to 16 years.

Article 1 and Part V of the report form. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the results of the 2004 study (subsequently published in 2006) entitled "Childhood and adolescence: Work and other economic activities" conducted by ILO-IPEC, the National Statistics and Census Institute of Argentina and the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Security in three provinces in the north-west of the country (Jujuy, Salta and Tucumán), two in the north-east (Formosa and Chaco), the province of Mendoza and the metropolitan region of Buenos Aires. It noted with interest the measures taken as part of the implementation of the National Plan for the Prevention and Elimination of Child Labour. In this regard, it particularly noted the following information: (i) the signing of an agreement between the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Security and the Ministry of Education, Science and Technology with a view to implementing the National Programme for Educational Integration, which provides for measures to enable working children to quit their jobs and re-enter or remain in the school system, including remedial courses and economic assistance; (ii) the establishment of the network of enterprises against child labour on 27 June 2007; (iii) the increased participation of workers' organizations in efforts to combat child labour, which led to the signing of a memorandum of intent for the prevention and elimination of child labour in agriculture on 12 June 2007; (iv) training workshops for labour inspectors and tobacco producers in Salta and Jujuy; and (v) campaigns to raise awareness of the use of child labour, especially in tobacco plantations, among the general public, teachers and health officials. The Committee also noted that the results of a survey conducted in 2006 on the work of boys, girls and young persons between 5 and 17 years of age in the provinces of Córdoba and Misiones were being validated.

The Committee notes the results of the 2006 survey communicated in the Government's report. According to this survey, 8.4 per cent of children between 5 and 13 years of age and 29.7 per cent of children between 14 and 17 years of age are engaged in economic activity. As regards the province of Córdoba, children between 5 and 13 years of age work particularly in the following sectors: assistance in commerce, office work or workshops, childcare, non-residential care for elderly or sick persons, and other service-related or commercial activities such as roadside vending or services rendered to third parties. The main areas of activity of young persons between 14 and 17 years of age are assistance in commerce, work in offices or workshops, assistance with construction or repair work and other activities in the tertiary sector such as non-residential care for elderly or sick persons. The vast majority of children between 5 and 13 years of age in the province of Córdoba are involved in family work (72 per cent), whereas young persons between 14 and 17 years of age generally work for an employer (44 per cent) or on a self-employed basis. In addition, the survey reveals that premature entry to the world of employment has a negative impact on children's success in school. Accordingly, 15 per cent of children who worked during the reference week used for the survey have repeated a school year and 50 per cent of working adolescents do not attend school in the province of Córdoba. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the percentage of young people who work and do not attend school in the other provinces of the country, as shown by the 2004 study, is lower than in the province of Córdoba (25 per cent).

The Committee duly notes the various measures taken by the Government as part of the National Plan for the Prevention and Elimination of Child Labour. It notes in particular that, under Decree No. 1602/2009 of 29 October 2009, the provision of family benefits has been expanded and these are now awarded to children whose parents are unemployed or working in the informal or domestic sectors. It also notes that various training workshops have been established in order to strengthen the labour inspectorate in its action to prevent and combat child labour. According to the information supplied in the Government's report, between 2007 and 2009 labour inspectors identified 43,042 children who were at risk. Finally, the Committee observes that provincial committees were set up in 23 out of 24 provinces in the country. The task of these committees is to implement locally the measures adopted in the context of the National Plan. Two national meetings of regional committees are held each year in order to formulate joint action strategies.

The Committee notes, however, that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations of June 2010 on the third and fourth periodic reports of Argentina (CRC/C/ARG/CO3-4, paragraph 73) noted with concern the absence of effective coordination mechanisms, as well as insufficient structures for enforcement at the provincial level. The Committee requests the Government to step up its efforts to ensure the effective implementation of the National Plan for the Prevention and Elimination of Child Labour, particularly at provincial level. It requests the Government to continue to supply information on the action taken and the results achieved in the context of the National Plan, indicating the number of children who have benefited from these measures. The Committee further requests the Government to continue to supply information on the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice, including extracts from the reports of the inspection services and information on the number and nature of violations reported and penalties imposed.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes the comments of the General Confederation of Labour (CGT), dated 29 October 2010, and the Government's report. With reference to its comments under the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), on the sale and trafficking of children and, as Convention No. 182 addresses these worst forms of child labour, the Committee considers that they may be examined more specifically in the context of the present Convention.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted with interest the adoption of Act No. 26.364 of 30 April 2008 on the prevention of, and conviction for, the trafficking of persons and on assistance to victims. In its observations under Convention No. 29, it notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) concerning the international dimension of trafficking according to which Argentina is a country of destination of trafficking for the sexual exploitation of women and young girls from the Dominican Republic, Paraguay and Brazil. It noted that Argentinian women and young girls, mostly originating from the provinces of Misiones, Tucumán, La Rioja, Chaco and Buenos Aires, are also subjected to sexual exploitation abroad, mainly in Spain and Brazil. The Committee also observed that the ITUC's comments report corruption in the police forces and the direct involvement of police officers in criminal activities related to the trafficking of persons. Furthermore, according to the ITUC, the involvement of the police is one of the significant factors explaining the increase in cases of domestic and international trafficking reported over recent years, as well as the ineffectiveness of the criminal procedures conducted to endeavour to bring those responsible for these acts to justice.

The Committee notes the information from the Office for the Assistance and Support of Victims of Trafficking (Oficina de Rescate y Acompañamiento a Personas Damnificadas por el Delito de Trata) of the Ministry of Justice, Security and Human Rights, contained in the Government's report on the application in practice of Act No. 26.364 of 30 April 2008. It notes with interest that, since the entry into force of the Act and up to 31 July 2010, a total of 590 raids were carried out, 583 persons were arrested and 921 victims were assisted, including 204 children under 18 years of age. These cases resulted in 15 convictions for the trafficking of persons for sexual exploitation, for which the sentences ranged from four to 15 years of imprisonment. The Committee requests the Government to continue taking the necessary measures to ensure that thorough investigations and vigorous prosecutions of persons engaged in the sale and trafficking of children under 18 years of age, including State employees suspected of complicity, are completed and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed in practice. It requests the Government to continue providing information on the number of investigations conducted, prosecutions and convictions under Act No. 26.364 of 30 April 2008.

Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of a child for prostitution. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the provisions of the Penal Code do not cover the use of a child for prostitution. The Government, however, indicated that Act No. 26.364 of 30 April 2008 covers the use of a child for prostitution. The Committee drew the Government's attention to the fact that, in the context of the Convention, the use of a child for prostitution applies equally to a person, in this case a client, who performs a sexual act with a child under 18 years of age in return for payment or any other form of benefit. It therefore requested the Government to indicate the manner in which Act No. 26.364 of 30 April 2008 makes it possible, in practice, to prosecute and punish a client for using a child under 18 years of age for prostitution.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that Act No. 26.364 of 30 April 2008 does not provide for the penalization of a client for using a child under 18 years of age for prostitution. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures to prohibit and penalize the use of a child under 18 years of age for prostitution, in accordance with Article 3(b) of the Convention.

Article 4(1). Establishment of the list of hazardous types of work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that a draft Decree regulating the types of work that are hazardous to children had been prepared, and that the activities included in Paragraph 3 of the Worst Forms of Child Labour Recommendation, 1999 (No. 190), had been taken into consideration.

Nevertheless, the Committee notes the CGT's comments that the list of hazardous types of work has still not been established. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the draft Decree establishing the list of hazardous types of work is adopted without delay. It requests the Government to provide information on any new development in this respect.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing children from being engaged in the worst forms of child labour and removing them from such labour. Commercial sexual exploitation of children and trafficking for this purpose. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the establishment of the National Programme for the Prevention and Elimination of the Trafficking of Persons and Assistance to Victims. It observed that one of the objectives of this Programme is to promote inter-institutional collaboration between government agencies, NGOs and other civil society institutions for the implementation of action to prevent the trafficking of persons and to provide assistance for the social integration of the victims of trafficking.

The Committee notes the establishment of the Office for Assistance and Support to Victims of Trafficking in 2008. This Office is responsible for centralizing action for the prevention and investigation of trafficking of persons, and measures of psychological, medical and legal support and assistance for victims. It also notes that assistance for the rehabilitation and social integration of such children is the responsibility of the Service for the Prevention of, and Assistance to, Victims of Trafficking of Persons (Area de prevención de atención a víctimas de trata de personas), which is under the responsibility of the Secretariat for Childhood, Adolescence and the Family (SENNAF).

However, the Committee observes in this respect that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations of 18 June 2010 on the application of the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography (CRC/C/OPSC/ARG/CO/1, paragraph 39), expressed concern at the absence of a sustained intervention over a period of time for victims, in particular of trafficking. The Committee requests the Government to provide additional information on the concrete measures taken by the Service for the Prevention of and Assistance to Victims of Trafficking of Persons and the Office for Assistance and Support to Victims of Trafficking to prevent children becoming victims of commercial sexual exploitation or trafficking for that purpose, and to provide the necessary and appropriate direct assistance for their removal from these worst forms of child labour and to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. In respect, it requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved in terms of the number of children who are in practice removed from this worst form of child labour and who have benefited from integration measures.

Article 8. International cooperation. MERCOSUR. The Committee previously noted with interest the measures adopted in the context of MERCOSUR, and particularly the adoption of the Agreement on the introduction of a shared database on boys, girls and young persons in a vulnerable situation and the Agreement on regional cooperation for the protection of the rights of boys, girls and young persons in a vulnerable situation. It also noted that a regional strategy to combat the trafficking of children and young persons for purposes of sexual exploitation and their illegal trafficking is being prepared in MERCOSUR countries, with Argentina, Brazil, Paraguay and Uruguay as pilot countries.

The Committee notes the CGT's allegations that the Regional Plan for the Prevention and Elimination of Child Labour adopted in the context of MERCOSUR is not effective in practice. It notes the information provided in the Government's report by the National Commission for the Elimination of Child Labour (CONAETI), which indicates that a meeting was held in November 2009 in Montevideo to make progress with the implementation of the Regional Plan. In this respect, the Committee notes that a preliminary agenda was drawn up for the holding of a workshop on good practices for the prevention and elimination of child labour. It also notes the information provided in the Government's report of 11 March 2010 on the application of the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography (CRC/C/OPSC/ARG/1, paragraph 289), according to which the SENNAF has coordinated action with a view to developing joint strategies of action against the sexual exploitation of children in the area known as the Triple Frontier, where the borders of Argentina, Brazil and Paraguay meet. Accordingly, the three countries signed a cooperation agreement on action to combat the sexual exploitation of children (paragraph 290), and an awareness-raising campaign was conducted (paragraph 291), following the conclusion of this agreement. Furthermore, in October 2008, the SENNAF reiterated the experience between the Argentinian city of La Quiaca and the city of Villazón in the Plurinational State of Bolivia, which are joined by the international La Quiaca bridge. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the measures adopted and the results achieved in the context of the Regional Plan for the Prevention and Elimination of Child Labour in MERCOSUR and requests it to indicate whether the Regional Strategy to Combat the Trafficking of Children and Young Persons for Sexual Exploitation is currently being implemented. It also requests the Government to provide additional information on the common action taken in the context of the cooperation agreement to combat the sexual exploitation of children signed with Brazil and Paraguay, and on the measures adopted in practice to reinforce cooperation in the La Quiaca/Villazón region.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2000)

Article 7 of the Convention. Light work. The Committee had previously noted that, by virtue of section 5(a)(1) of the Employment of Children and Adolescents Act (hereinafter ECYPA), children aged "12 years" may be employed, outside the hours specified for school attendance: (1) on activities in enterprises in which only members of the enterprise owner's family are employed; (2) in a private household; (3) in errand running; ancillary activities in sport and play areas, the gathering of flowers, herbs, mushrooms and fruit and other activities similar to these, provided that this applies to light and occasional activities and that work performed in an enterprise of a commercial nature or in an employment relationship is not included under subsection (3). The Committee also noted the Government's statement that, according to section 110(3) of the Provincial Labour Act, children under 12 years of age may be employed, under certain conditions, in occasional light work in enterprises in which only members of the owner's family are employed. The Committee noted that the ECYPA and the Provincial Labour Act contain provisions regulating the number of hours during which, and the conditions in which, light work may be undertaken in accordance with Article 7(3) of the Convention. The Committee reminded the Government that pursuant to Article 7(1) of the Convention, only children from 13 years of age may be permitted to perform light work, which is not likely to be harmful to their health or development and not such as to prejudice their attendance at school, or their participation in vocational training programmes.

The Committee notes from the Government's information that following negotiations with the social partners to bring the ECYPA and the Agriculture Labour Act in line with Article 7 of the Convention, draft legislation has been prepared and submitted for assessment (assessment draft 141/ME XXVI.GP – Ministerial draft). The Committee notes with interest that the draft proposes to raise the minimum age for light work and occasional work to 13 years. The Committee notes that the draft must be submitted to the Council of Ministers for processing and lastly to Parliament to be passed as a bill. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the assessment draft 141/ME XXVI.GP, fixing the minimum age for light work at 13 years of age will be adopted by Parliament at the earliest possible date. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on all progress made in this regard and to provide a copy of the amended legislation as soon as it has been adopted.

Part V of the report form. Practical application of the Convention. The Committee notes the information in the Government's report on the breakdown of the violations concerning the employment of children and young persons, both by economic sector and by federal province in 2008–09. In 2008, a total of four and 1,155 violations concerning children and young persons, respectively, were detected; in 2009, these numbers were seven and 1,246, respectively. In both years, the vast majority of the violations detected were in the sectors of: hotels and restaurants; the repair of motor vehicles and consumer goods; and construction. In 2008, 515 of all violations concerned rest breaks, rest time, night rest periods, rest on Sundays, public holidays and weekly working hours; in 2009, the number of these violations was 597. The other violations detected concerned: the keeping of registers of children and young persons; prohibited and restricted work; and maximum working hours. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the manner in which the Convention is applied, including, for example, statistical data on the employment of children and young persons and information on the number and nature of violations detected involving children and young persons.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1992)

Article 2(1) of the Convention. 1. Scope of application. The Committee had previously taken note of section 7(2) of the Labour Code of 1999, which rules that “labour relations shall be established upon the execution of a written employment contract”, and section 4(1) declaring that “this Code applies to all enterprises, establishments, organizations as well as workplaces where an employment agreement exists”. The Committee had requested the Government to supply information on the measures taken to ensure the application of the Convention to all types of work outside an employment relationship.

The Committee notes the absence of information in the Government's report on this point. The Committee notes, however, that according to a survey conducted by the State Statistical Committee of the Republic of Azerbaijan in cooperation with ILO–IPEC, entitled: Working children in Azerbaijan – The analysis of child labour and labouring children survey, 2005, the majority of working children (about 65 per cent) are employed as unpaid family workers, while 25.1 per cent of children work on their own account and less than 10 per cent are wage workers. The survey further indicates that about 84.4 per cent of child labourers are found in the agricultural sector. Recalling that Convention No. 138 requires the fixing of a minimum age for all types of work or employment and not only for work under an employment contract, and observing that it has been raising this matter for several years, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that children carrying out an economic activity on their own account are granted the protection afforded by the Convention. In this regard, it requests the Government to envisage the possibility of taking measures to adapt and strengthen the labour inspection services so as to ensure that the protection envisaged by the Convention is provided to children who work on their own account or in the informal economy.

2. Minimum age for admission to employment or work. The Committee had recalled that the minimum age of 16 years was specified under Article 2(1) of the Convention as regards Azerbaijan. It had noted with regret that the Labour Code, in section 42(3), allows a person who has reached the age of 15 to be part of an employment contract; section 249(1) of the same Code specifies that “persons who are under the age of 15 shall not be employed under any circumstances”. Moreover, the Individual Contracts of Employment Agreement Act, section 12(2), sets the minimum age for concluding an employment contract at 14 years.

The Committee notes the Government's information that pursuant to the amendments made to the Labour Code on December 2009 (Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan of 4 December 2009, No. 924-IIIQD), subsection (2) of section 249 shall be deleted. It notes, however, that this provision deals with admission of children of general vocational schools and who have attained the age of 14 years of age for industrial training. It also notes the Government's information that section 46(4) of the Labour Code which was amended in 2009 states that the contracts concluded with persons who have not reached the age of 15 years shall be invalid. The Committee had observed for a number of years that sections 42(3) and 249(1) of the Labour Code and section 12(2) of the Individual Contracts of Agreement Act and section 46(4) of the Labour Code as amended, permit a child of 14 or 15 years to conclude a contract of employment, even though the specified minimum age for admission to employment or work is 16 years. The Committee once again points out that the Convention allows and encourages the raising of the minimum age but does not permit lowering of the minimum age once specified. Observing that it has been raising this matter for several years, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that no children under the age of 16 years is permitted to work, except for light work as permitted under Article 7 of the Convention.

Article 3(2). Determination of types of hazardous work. The Committee had previously noted the Government's indication that a list of arduous and hazardous industries or occupations where the employment of persons under 18 years of age is prohibited was approved by Decision No. 58 of the Cabinet of Ministers of the Republic of Azerbaijan on 24 March 2000. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the list of hazardous work prohibited to children under 18 years and approved by Decision No. 58 of the Cabinet of Ministers shall be supplied to the Office in the near future. Observing that the list of hazardous types of work was adopted in 2000, the Committee expresses the firm hope that a copy of this list will be sent along with the Government's next report.

Article 7. Light work. The Committee had previously noted that section 249(2) of the Labour Code allows youths who have reached the age of 14 to work after school hours in light duty work, which poses no hazard to their health, and upon the written consent of their parents. It had further noted that sections 91(2), 119(1) and 133(3) of the Labour Code lay down the conditions of work of persons under 16 years of age and sections 252 and 254 provide for the conditions of work of persons under 18 years of age. The Committee had recalled that according to Article 7(3) of the Convention, the competent authority shall determine the activities in which employment or work may be permitted as light work. Noting the absence of information in this regard, the Committee once again requests the Government to supply further information on the types of light work that are permitted for persons who have attained 14 years of age.

Article 9(1). Penalties. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's indication that according to section 12(2) of the Labour Code as amended in 2009, an employer who violates the provisions related to the employment of persons who have not reached 15 years of age and the prohibition on engaging children in activities endangering their life, health or morality shall be brought to corresponding responsibility in accordance with the procedure established by law. It also notes the Government's reference to sections 310–313 of the Labour Code which deal with the liability for violating the rights defined in this Code, as well as the disciplinary, administrative and criminal actions for the violation of the labour law. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the provision which establishes penalties for the breach of the provisions giving effect to the Convention.

Parts III and V of the report form. Labour inspection and practical application of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, according to section 308 of the Labour Code, the Office of the Public Prosecutor, as well as the State Labour Inspectorate, exercise control over the strict application of the Labour Code. Furthermore, the public control over the observance of the labour legislation shall be carried out by the trade unions and the employers' organizations. The Committee notes, however, that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations of 17 March 2006 (CRC/C/AZE/CO/2, paragraphs 61–62), expressed concern at the high number of working children in Azerbaijan, especially in rural areas, and that the regulations protecting children from exploitative and hazardous work are not consistently applied and respected. It also notes that according to the survey conducted in 2005 by the State Statistical Committee of the Republic of Azerbaijan in cooperation with ILO–IPEC, more than 156,000 children aged between 5 and 17 years are estimated to be engaged in some form of economic activity, out of which 84.4 per cent work in the agricultural sector, and about 67.6 per cent of working children are estimated to be engaged in hazardous work. The Committee expresses its concern over the number and situation of working children in Azerbaijan, as well as the weak enforcement of the Convention and accordingly urges the Government to redouble its efforts to improve this situation including through measures to strengthen the capacity and expand the reach of the labour inspection system. It requests the Government to provide information on the concrete measures taken in this respect and on the results achieved. The Committee once again asks the Government to supply data to give a general appreciation of the manner in which the Convention is applied, for instance, statistical data on the employment of children and young persons, extracts from the report of inspection services, and information on the number and nature of contraventions reported.

[The Government is asked to supply full particulars to the Conference at its 100th Session and to reply in detail to the present comments in 2011.]

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of a child for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances. The Committee previously noted that, by virtue of section 355 of the Penal Code, it is an offence to print, import, export, own, possess, carry or display, with the intent of exploiting, distributing or showing any publications, drawings, pictures, films, symbols or such other items if they violate public morals. However, the Committee observed that the Penal Code does not prohibit the use, procuring or offering of a child for the production of pornography or pornographic performances.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that Sharia law is a main source of legislation in Bahrain. The Government indicates that the culture of the country refuses all illicit sexual activities as well as the exploitation of children, even if a particular offence is not specified in the Penal Code. Nonetheless, the Committee notes the Government's statement in its report to the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC) of 25 March 2010 that a draft law on the rights of the child is currently before the Chamber of Deputies, including a chapter on the protection of children. The Government indicates that this chapter contains provisions on sexual offences (CRC/C/BHR/2-3, paragraph 508), though it is not specified if these provisions include the protection of children from use in the production of pornography. Reminding the Government that pursuant to Article 1, the Government must take “immediate measures” to secure the prohibition of the worst forms of child labour, the Committee urges the Government to take immediate measures to explicitly prohibit, in national legislation, the use, procuring or offering of a child for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances, in conformity with Article 3(b) of the Convention. In this regard, the Committee encourages the Government to consider including a specific prohibition of this offence in the draft law on the rights of the child, currently before the Chamber of Deputies.

Clause (c). Use, procuring or offering of a child for illicit activities, in particular for the production and trafficking of drugs. The Committee previously observed that sections 2 and 3 of Law No. 4 of 1974 on controlling the use and circulation of narcotic substances and preparations prohibit the importing, exporting, producing, possessing, buying, selling, exchanging or disposing of narcotic substances. However, it noted that the use, procuring or offering of a child for the production and trafficking of drugs does not appear to be prohibited by national legislation.

The Committee notes the Government’s statement that the trafficking of drugs is prohibited in Bahrain and that the culture of Bahrain refuses the exploitation of children for this purpose. However, the Committee notes the Government’s statement in its report to the CRC of 25 March 2010, concerning the available support for delinquents, that the cases of delinquency noted among youth include the involvement of minors in the trafficking of drugs (CRC/C/BHR/2-3, paragraph 463). Recalling that the use, procuring or offering of a child for illicit activities, in particular for the production and trafficking of drugs, constitutes one of the worst forms of child labour, the Committee strongly requests the Government to take immediate measures to ensure that this worst form is explicitly prohibited in the near future.

Clause (d). 1. Hazardous work. The Committee previously noted that section 51 of the Labour Law states that juveniles aged under 16 years may be employed in industries and occupations other than those deemed to be hazardous or unhealthy and enumerated by an Order of the Minister of Health, in cooperation with the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs. However, the Committee noted the Government’s indication that the Labour Law would be amended to provide for the protection of children under 18 as required under the Convention. The Government indicated that ministerial orders would be promulgated in order to enact the new Labour Law, which was adopted by the Shoura Council and the Chamber of Deputies.

The Committee notes the Government’s statement that any new developments regarding ministerial orders addressing the employment of persons under 18 years will be communicated to the Committee. The Committee reminds the Government that, by virtue of Article 3(d), work which, by its nature and the circumstances in which it is carried out, is likely to harm the health, safety or morals of persons under 18, constitutes one of the worst forms of child labour, and that pursuant to Article 1, the Government must take immediate measures to secure the prohibition of this worst form, as a matter of urgency. Observing that the Government has been stating its intention to bring its labour legislation into conformity with Article 3(d) of the Convention since 2004, the Committee strongly urges the Government to take the necessary measures, without delay, to ensure the promulgation of the relevant ministerial orders, prohibiting the engagement of persons under 18 in hazardous work.

2. Self-employed, domestic, casual and agricultural workers. The Committee previously observed that, pursuant to section 1 of the Labour Law, working persons not under the control and supervision of an employer, such as self-employed workers, were excluded from the scope of application of the Labour Law. It also noted that, pursuant to section 2 of the Labour Law, domestic servants, persons employed in temporary and casual work (for periods shorter than three months), and most persons employed in agricultural work were excluded from the Law’s application.

The Committee notes the Government’s statement that children do not work in these excluded sectors. The Government indicates that most self-employed workers in the country are taxi drivers, a job that children do not perform as driving licenses are only obtainable from the age of 18. The Government also indicates that domestic labour is not performed by the national labour force, and that agriculture is a small sector (representing 2 per cent of the labour force), though children may work with their parents in this sector during summer vacation. The Committee also notes the Government’s statement in its report to the CRC of 25 March 2010 that most agricultural work is performed by foreign workers (CRC/C/BHR/2-3, paragraph 501). In this regard, the Committee notes the Government’s statement that foreign workers under 18 may not enter the country, and are not issued work permits. The Committee further notes the information in a report on the worst forms of child labour in Bahrain of 10 September 2009, available on the website of the Office of the High Commissioner of Refugees (www.unhcr.org) that immigration officials take measures to ensure that foreign workers entering Bahrain are 18 years or older. Nonetheless, the Committee notes the information from UNICEF that, between 1999 and 2008, approximately 5 per cent of children in Bahrain between the ages of 5 and 14 were engaged in child labour. The Committee observes that much of this work appears to be performed in sectors not covered by the Labour Law, noting the statement in the report of the International Trade Union Confederation, for the World Trade Organization General Council on the trade policies of Bahrain of 18 and 20 July 2007, entitled Internationally recognized core labour standards in Bahrain (ITUC Report) that children are reported to work in family businesses in addition to informal sector activities, as car washers, vendors and porters (page 6). In this regard, the ITUC Report emphasizes the need to introduce legal prohibitions to ensure that workers under 18 in these sectors do not perform hazardous work. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that children under 18 working in the informal sector and in family businesses are protected against work which is likely to harm their health, safety or morals.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (d). Identify and reach out to children at special risk. Children engaged in begging. The Committee notes the Government's statement in its report to the CRC of 25 March 2010 that, following a rise in begging and vagrancy in the country, including the exploitation of children for the purpose of begging, the Government took several measures to address this phenomenon (CRC/C/BHR/2-3, paragraph 352). The Government adopted Law No. 5 of 2007 on combating begging and vagrancy, section 4 of which provides for the placement of vagrants in a shelter specializing in the protection of persons living in the street (CRC/C/BHR/2-3, paragraph 502). The Government indicates that this shelter has the capacity to receive 80 persons, and houses persons for ten days while their case is evaluated. At the expiration of this period, if the person is a minor, they are transferred to the centre for the protection of minors. The Committee expresses its concern at reports of the exploitation of children for the purpose of begging, and urges the Government to pursue its efforts to provide for the removal of these children and to provide for their rehabilitation and social integration. It requests the Government to provide information on the number of children reached through measures taken in this regard.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes that the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women, in its concluding observations of 14 November 2008, expressed concern at the existence of trafficking of women and girls into Bahrain for the purpose of sexual exploitation, and expressed regret at the lack of statistical data on this phenomenon (CEDAW/C/BHR/CO/2, paragraph 26). The Committee expresses its concern at reports of child trafficking in Bahrain, and urges the Government to redouble its efforts to eliminate this worst form of child labour. It also requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that data on the worst forms of child labour in the country, particularly child trafficking and the use of children for the purpose of begging, is made available. To the extent possible, all information provided should be disaggregated by sex and age.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Sale and trafficking of children. The Committee had previously noted that sections 5(1) and 6(1) of the Suppression of Violence against Women and Children Act (SVWCA) prohibit the sale and trafficking of women (irrespective of their age) and children for purposes of prostitution or immoral acts. Noting that, by virtue of section 2(k) of the SVWCA, as amended in 2003, a "child" means a person under 16 years of age, it had observed that the SVWCA did not prohibit the sale and trafficking of boys between 16 and 18 years of age. The Committee had noted the Government's indication that it would take the necessary steps to amend the SVWCA in order to ensure that the sale and trafficking of all children under 18 years of age is prohibited.

The Committee notes from the Government's report that no developments have been made so far with regard to the amendments to the SVWCA. It once again notes the Government's indication that it will gradually take the necessary measures to amend the SVWCA in order to ensure that the sale and trafficking of all children under 18 years of age is prohibited. The Committee also observes that the provisions under the SVWCA cover only trafficking for sexual exploitation and do not prohibit the sale and trafficking of children, both boys and girls, for labour exploitation. It notes the information in a report of 14 June 2010 on trafficking of persons in Bangladesh, available on the website of the Office of the High Commissioner for Refugees (www.unhcr.org) (Trafficking Report) that children, both boys and girls, are trafficked within Bangladesh for commercial sexual exploitation, bonded labour and forced labour. While some children are sold into bondage by their parents, some others are induced into labour or commercial sexual exploitation through fraud and coercion. The Committee once again reminds the Government that, under Article 3(a) of the Convention, the sale and trafficking of children under 18 years of age for labour or sexual exploitation is considered to be one of the worst forms of child labour and that, under the terms of Article 1 of the Convention, immediate and effective measures must be taken to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. In this respect, the Committee once again requests the Government to take immediate steps to ensure that the amendments to the SVWCA, which would prohibit the sale and trafficking of both boys and girls under 18 years for labour and sexual exploitation, are adopted in the very near future. It also requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Clause (d). Hazardous work. Child domestic workers. The Committee had previously noted that, according to the World Confederation of Labour (WCL), child domestics worked in conditions that resembled servitude. It had also noted the Government's reply that forced labour is prohibited by virtue of article 34 of the Constitution and that child domestics were usually well treated and were not subject to forced or bonded labour. The Committee had nevertheless noted that, according to the National Time-bound Programme Framework (TICSA-II, 2006) (TBP), child domestics constituted a high-risk group who were outside the normal reach of labour controls and were scattered and isolated within the households in which they work. This isolation, together with the children's dependency on their employers, laid the ground for potential abuse and exploitation. The long hours, low or no wages, poor food, overwork and hazards implicit in the working conditions affected the children's physical health.

The Committee notes the Government's information that a guideline to protect child domestic workers from the worst forms of child labour is under preparation. The Committee notes that, in its concluding observations of 26 June 2009, the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC) expressed concern that girls engaged as child domestic workers are more vulnerable to violence and exploitation (CRC/C/BGD/CO/4, paragraph 82). The Committee also notes that, according to a survey by the ILO entitled "Baseline Survey on Child Domestic Labour in Bangladesh, 2006", the number of child domestic workers in Bangladesh was estimated at 421,426, mostly girls, of which 147,943 were in Dhaka city alone and the rest in other urban and rural households. About 6 per cent of the child domestic workers were below the age of 8 years, 21 per cent below the age of 11 years and 74 per cent below the age of 17 years. The report further indicates that more than 99 per cent of the child domestics worked 7 days a week for exceedingly long hours, and more than 52 per cent of them did not receive any wages. The Committee expresses its deep concern at the number and situation of child domestic workers in the country. It reminds the Government that, pursuant to Article 3(d) of the Convention, work or employment in conditions that are hazardous are among the worst forms of child labour and are therefore to be eliminated as a matter of urgency, in accordance with Article 1. The Committee accordingly urges the Government to take the necessary measures, in law and in practice, to protect child domestic workers under 18 years of age from hazardous work. In this regard, it requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that thorough investigations and robust prosecutions of persons who employ children under 18 years of age in hazardous domestic work are carried out and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are applied in practice. It further requests the Government to take the necessary measures to provide for the withdrawal of child domestic workers from hazardous work and for their rehabilitation and social integration.

Articles 5 and 7(1). Monitoring mechanisms and penalties. Law enforcement agencies. The Committee had previously noted that the police and other law enforcement agencies, as well as local governmental organizations, were involved in the fight against trafficking, and that the country had expanded anti-trafficking police units to every district to encourage victims to testify against traffickers and to compile data on trafficking. The Committee had further noted the Government's information that it had taken measures to provide special training to prosecutors, and to develop a trafficking course for the national police academy and the immigration officials to combat trafficking in persons.

The Committee notes the Government's information that it has initiated two projects, namely, the Community Based Working Child Protection Project (CBWCP) executed by the Ministry of Home Affairs, and the Actions for Combating Trafficking-in-Persons (ACT) executed by the International Organization for Migration (IOM) which aim to combat human trafficking, enhance preventive and protective measures, improve victim care and strengthen the Government's capacity to prosecute trafficking and trafficking-related crimes. It also notes that, according to the Trafficking Report, in 2009, the National Police Academy provided anti-trafficking training to 2,875 police officers. Moreover, 12 police officers from the Trafficking in Human Beings Investigation Unit received training on investigation techniques. The report further states that the Ministry of Home Affairs' Anti-trafficking Monitoring Cell collects data on trafficking arrests, prosecutions and rescues and coordinates and analyses local level information from regional anti-trafficking units. The Committee also notes the information contained in this report that during the period from 2008–09 there was some evidence of official complicity in human trafficking, as well as low-level government employees who were also complicit in trafficking. The report further indicates that politicians and regional gangs were also involved in human trafficking. In this regard, the Committee notes the information in a report on the worst forms of child labour in Bangladesh of 10 September 2009, available on the website of the Office of the High Commissioner for Refugees (www.unhcr.org) (WFCL Report), that from April 2008 to February 2009, 166 traffickers were arrested in Bangladesh, of which 18 were convicted. The Committee expresses its concern at allegations of complicity and cooperation of law enforcement officials and other government officials with human traffickers. The Committee therefore urges the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure that perpetrators of human trafficking and complicit officials are investigated and prosecuted and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed in practice. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that vigorous investigations and robust prosecutions of offenders are carried out, including by strengthening the role of the prosecutors, the police and the immigration officials. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this respect, and the results achieved, particularly the number of persons investigated, prosecuted, convicted and sentenced for cases involving victims under the age of 18.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee had previously noted that the CRC, in its concluding observations, expressed regret that data on the extent of the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography and on the number of children involved in these activities was very limited, mainly due to the absence of a comprehensive data collection system (CRC/C/OPSC/BGD/CO/1, paragraph 6). The Committee notes the Government's statement that the child labour surveys conducted in 1995–97 and 2001–03 indicated a reduction in child labour (of the age group of 5–14 years) from 18.3 per cent to 14.2 per cent, respectively. The Committee notes, however, that the CRC, in its concluding observations of 26 June 2009 (CRC/C/BGD/CO/4, paragraph 82), expressed concern at the continuing high incidence of child workers in five selected worst forms of child labour namely, welding, auto workshops, road transport, battery recharging and recycling, and work in tobacco factories. The CRC also expressed concern at the lack of enforcement mechanisms of specific laws to protect child workers, the absence of mechanisms to monitor the working conditions of child workers, insufficient awareness amongst the public of the negative effects of child labour and its worst forms, and the very limited data on the number of children affected. The Committee expresses its deep concern at the situation of children working in the abovementioned worst forms of child labour, and accordingly urges the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure in practice the protection of children from these worst forms. It also requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that sufficient data on these worst forms of child labour, as well as child trafficking are made available. To the extent possible, all information provided should be disaggregated by sex and age.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1988)

Article 3(3) of the Convention. Admission to hazardous work from the age of 16 years. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 8 of the Royal Order of 3 May 1999 on the protection of young persons at work (Royal Order of 1999), prohibits the employment of young persons in the hazardous types of work listed under section 8(2) of the Order, namely work involving exposure to agents that are toxic, carcinogenic, cause hereditary genetic alterations, have harmful effects for the foetus during pregnancy or any other chronic harmful effect on human beings. Section 10 of the Order provides that this prohibition does not apply to “young persons at work” other than those who are student workers. Under section 2 of the Royal Order, the term “young person at work” means any working minor of 15 years of age or more who is not subject to full-time compulsory schooling, apprentices, trainees, pupils and students. The Committee noted the Government’s indication that authorization, by way of a dispensation, to perform hazardous work applies solely to “young persons at work” who are engaged in vocational training and provided that the following conditions are met: the work or presence of young persons in dangerous places must be essential to prevent their training from being interrupted or jeopardized; preventive measures must be taken; and the work must be performed in the company of an experienced worker. The Committee noted that the Code on Wellbeing at Work (Code), which incorporates all royal orders issued under the Act of 4 August 1996 concerning the well-being of workers in the performance of their work, also incorporates the Royal Order of 1999. It noted that the text of the Royal Order of 1999 constitutes Chapter I “Young persons at work” of Title XI “Specific Categories of Workers” of the Code, which will be incorporated in the form of a new royal order. Section 2(1) of the Royal Order of 1999, once incorporated in the Code, will become Title XI, section 2(1) of the Code. Furthermore, the Committee noted that this provision raises to 16 years the minimum age for admission to the work defined therein and that young persons engaged in tasks deemed to be hazardous, pursuant to section 8(2) of the Royal Order of 1999, will be able to work only as from the age of 16 years and in accordance with the conditions set out in section 10 of the said Order. The Committee noted, however, that the new Code, which will raise the minimum age for young persons at work to 16 years, does not as yet exist officially in the form of a royal order since it has been submitted for an opinion to the Higher Council for Prevention and Protection at Work and will thereafter be submitted to the Council of State for an opinion.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the Royal Order of 1999 prohibits young persons under 18 years of age from carrying out certain work and provides for occupational safety measures and the monitoring of the health of these young workers. However, it notes with regret that the report contains no information on the incorporation of the Royal Order of 1999 into the Code on Wellbeing at Work, which raises the minimum age for admission to work from 15 to 16 years. The Committee reminds the Government that, under Article 3(3) of the Convention, the national laws or regulations may, after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers, authorize the performance of hazardous work by young persons as from the age of 16 years on condition that their health, safety and morals are fully protected and that they have received adequate specific instruction or vocational training in the relevant branch of activity. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure that its legislation is in conformity with the Convention by ensuring that the performance of hazardous work may not under any circumstances be authorized in respect of children under 16 years of age. In this regard, it once again expresses the firm hope that the new Code on Wellbeing at Work, which raises the minimum age for admission to work from 15 to 16 years, will enter into force as soon as possible. It requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 5 of the Convention. Monitoring mechanisms. Social assistance service. The Committee previously noted the Government’s information that the Social Assistance Agency (SAA) is an important party to the agreement towards the implementation of the National Strategy for Protection of the Rights of Children on the Street. The Committee further noted that the SAA conducts monthly monitoring of the activities of the Child Protection Departments with regard to child beggars and street children, and that the SAA helps the Child Protection Departments in identifying unaccompanied children abroad or child victims of trafficking. The Committee noted with interest in the Government's report that, in late 2005, on a proposal from the State Agency for Child Protection (SACP) and with the cooperation of the International Organization for Migration, a coordination mechanism for referring and servicing cases of unaccompanied Bulgarian children and child victims of trafficking on their return from abroad was adopted. From the introduction in November 2005 of this coordination mechanism until July 2007, the SACP has worked on some 230 cases of unaccompanied Bulgarian children or child victims of trafficking from abroad, with the number of referent cases for the entire 2007 year being 102. From the start of 2008 until the date of the Government's report, the SACP has been working on 30 new such cases. The Committee further noted that in June 2008, the Agreement on monitoring child labour (Agreement), of April 2003, was renewed between the SACP and the General Labour Inspectorate – Executive Agency and the SAA has now also joined this agreement. The Agreement was drafted in accordance with the adopted ILO principles, the requirements of the European Agency on the Protection of Young People at Work and the Memorandum of Understanding between the Bulgarian Government and the ILO. Its principle objective is, through the creation of appropriate mechanisms for coordination and cooperation between the three institutions and other acceding parties, to increase the effectiveness of the activities of all partners from the governmental and non-governmental sector, as well as the social partners, on the monitoring of child labour. The top priorities of the Agreement are: (a) building a culture for preventing the involvement of children in the worst forms of child labour; (b) the mutual exchange of information on the issues of children's rights and the use of child labour; (c) the development of a legal basis for protecting the labour of children up to 18 years of age; and (d) the creation of a system for monitoring child labour on the whole territory of the country. The parties to the Agreement reported that the use of child labour in Bulgaria has been decreasing progressively, though still remains a challenge mostly in the small and medium-sized enterprises, as well as in the sectors of the informal economy and domestic farms. The parties further agreed to periodically revise the Agreement. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the number of unaccompanied children and child victims of trafficking identified and registered by the SAA or the SACP, the measures taken to protect such children and the results achieved.

Article 6. Programmes of action to eliminate the worst forms of child labour. National Action Plan against the Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's information that the main objective of the National Action Plan is to adopt effective measures against sexual exploitation leading to the elimination of child pornography, prostitution, sexual bondage, sexual tourism, trafficking and trading of children, and providing rehabilitative measures for child victims of such exploitation. The Committee noted in the Government's report that the main priorities of the SAA since its inception are the prevention of: violence; the worst forms of child labour; trafficking; and the sexual exploitation of children. The Committee noted with interest the following measures taken by the SACP. The SACP commenced development of a specialized web site on counteracting the commercial sexual exploitation of children. The main purpose of the web site is to provide thorough information on the problems of sexual and labour exploitation such as: national legislation; international standards; national documents; and practices. The web site also has a form for submitting information, through which 450 cases of children's rights violations were forwarded and for which actions are being taken immediately on carrying out inspections and, if needed, in referring the cases to the competent authorities. In 2007, the SACP has worked on 203 such received cases and, in the period from January to July 2008, 174 such cases were submitted, of which 150 are new. The Committee also noted in the Government's report that, since 2006, the SACP is a member of the public council under the telephone hotline for the fight against illegal and damaging content in the Bulgarian Internet space and, as such, receives information from the public concerning materials of a pornographic nature or concerning violence to children. Furthermore, on 11 May 2005, the Ethic Code for the prevention of trafficking and sexual exploitation of children in the field of tourism was signed by the SACP, the Animus Association, as well as representatives of the country's tourist industry. The aim of the Ethic Code, which is available on the SACP web site, is to introduce a new approach to fighting child trafficking by motivating the private sector, especially the representatives of the tourist industry, to introduce measures for the prevention of the sexual exploitation of children by Bulgarian and foreign tourists. Finally, the Committee noted the development of a National Telephone Hotline for Children, in November 2007, by the SACP and the Bulgarian representation of UNICEF. It provides crisis intervention, consultation, specialized information on children's rights, and redirects to suitable providers of services and child protection units and social protection units. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the impact of these various measures in preventing and eliminating the commercial sexual exploitation of children.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (a). Prevent the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour. Social investment for children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's information that, with the aim to enhance access to education for all children, including those from families with low incomes, the Government adopted amendments to the Family Benefits for Children Act (FACA), according to which a new type of allowance depending on the school attendance of children was introduced. "Social investment for children" for their upbringing, education, socialization and health care was also introduced by the FACA. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the number of children who benefited from this programme. The Committee noted in the Government's report that, in the first six months of 2008, the monthly average of assistance, in the form of social investments under section 7 of the FACA, was provided to 423 families with 562 children, in the average monthly amount of 8,105 Bulgarian leva (BGN). For the same period of 2007, the assistance provided was to 328 families with 430 children and an average of BGN6,407 per month. The assistance granted covers total or partial expenses for things including: fees for crèches or kindergartens; canteen food; clothing and footwear; and school supplies. Monthly assistance also exists under section 8 of the FACA in the form of social investments for children. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the number of children who benefited from programmes such as the "social investment for children" programme.

Clause (b). Necessary and appropriate direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration. Child victims of trafficking. The Committee noted in the Government's report that there are five crisis centres in the country. In the period from 2007 to July 2008, approximately 100 children have passed through these centres, which provide a complex of social services aimed at satisfying the daily needs and preparing the social integration of child victims of violence and trafficking. Starting 1 January 2007, the crisis centres fell under state jurisdiction and thus started receiving financing from the state budget. This, in part, amounted to a significant increase of the standards of social services offered, including those by the crisis centres and centres for work with street children. The Committee noted that the basic services provided by the crisis centres are: food and shelter; satisfying health needs; psychological support; life and social skills; participation of the child in a school form of education; and preparation for reintegration into the family or, if impossible, taking an adequate protection measure. The placement of the children in the crisis centres, which have a capacity to accept up to ten children each, is done by the child protection units, under the applicable legal provisions, for a term of up to six months, subject to the individual child's necessities. After their stay in the crisis centres, the children are directed to other services and are actively monitored by child protection units in order to provide adequate support and to prevent a repetition of the same events to them, or other members of their family. The Committee noted with interest that child protection units have carried out monitoring and provided assistance in 35 cases in 2006, 37 cases in 2007, 31 cases in the first quarter of 2008 and in 32 cases in the second quarter of 2008. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the number of child victims of trafficking withdrawn from the worst forms of child labour and rehabilitated by the crisis centres.

Clause (d). Identify and reach out to children at special risk. Street children. The Committee previously noted that, within the framework of the National Strategy for Protection of the Rights of Children on the Street for 2003–05, an agreement between the SACP, the Ministry of the Interior, and the SAA was signed to regulate the application of the measures for protecting child beggars. The Committee further noted that an action plan for work with begging children was developed and executed in five districts. The Committee noted in the Government's report that an important part of the activities of child protection units is work with street children. The first priority is given to working with the family in assessing the parents' capacity to take care of their children and supporting parents in raising and educating children. The emphasis is put on the individual particularities of the children, as per the methods approved by the SAA and the SACP, and is directed towards preventing children from finding themselves on the streets by developing social services in support of the family. There are currently nine functioning centres working with street children, whose methods, conditions and manners of providing services are approved by the SAA and the SACP who, together in turn, establish minimum services, activities and quality requirements, as well as material supplies, staffing and organization of activities for the centres. Furthermore, there is currently a total capacity of 89 places in five children's shelters, which are viewed as a last resort protection measure and are only called upon after exhausting all other options within the family environment. Finally, the Committee noted with interest that child protection units have mobile teams, comprised of police authorities, representatives of non-governmental organizations and local commissions, surveying the streets in order to identify street children. In the first half of 2008, 1,535 child protection unit mobile teams were operational and for the same time period, 61 newly registered cases of begging children were discovered. As of June 2008, 743 children were in the register of children in need of special protection. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the impact of these measures on protecting street children and child beggars from the worst forms of child labour and the results achieved.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Burkina Faso

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 3, clause (a), and Article 7(1), of the Convention. Sale and trafficking of children and sanctions. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that there is a high level of trafficking of children for labour exploitation both within the country and as a source of child labour for other countries. The Committee also noted with interest that, since the adoption and implementation of Act No. 038-2003/AN of 27 May 2003 defining and repressing the trafficking of children (Act No. 038-2003/AN of 27 May 2003), 31 cases of trafficking had been prosecuted in the 19 higher courts and 18 individuals had been sentenced to terms of imprisonment ranging from one to three years.

The Committee noted with interest the adoption of Decree No. 2008-332/PRES of 19 June 2008 promulgating Act No. 029-2008/AN of 15 May 2008 on combating trafficking in persons and similar practices (Act on combating trafficking in persons and similar practices). Under section 26 of this Act, Act No. 038-2003/AN of 27 May 2003 is repealed. The Committee took due note that sections 3 and 4 of the Act on combating trafficking in persons and similar practices provides for terms of imprisonment ranging from five to 20 years.

The Committee noted the information provided by the Government that it has continued and stepped up its efforts to combat the trafficking of children. It also noted the several court decisions handed down by the High Court between 2004 and 2007. The Committee noted that the individuals who have been prosecuted for the trafficking of children were found guilty and sentenced to terms of imprisonment ranging from two to 24 months, sometimes accompanied by a fine, and were ordered to pay costs. The Committee noted, however, that of the seven prison sentences handed down, six were suspended; one person was sentenced to two months' imprisonment and another to a fine of 50,000 CFA francs. The Committee reminded the Government that the trafficking of children is a serious crime and that, under Article 7(1), of the Convention, the Government is obliged to take the necessary measures to ensure the effective implementation and enforcement of the provisions giving effect the Convention, including the application of sufficiently effective and dissuasive penal sanctions. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the penalties imposed on individuals found guilty of trafficking of children are sufficiently effective and dissuasive and that they are applied in practice. It requests the Government to provide information in this regard. The Committee also requests the Government to continue providing information on the application in practice of the Act on combating trafficking in persons and similar practices, including in particular, statistics on the number and nature of violations reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions imposed.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of labour. 1. Sale and trafficking of children. The Committee previously took due note of the information provided concerning the implementation in the country of the ILO–IPEC Programme on Combating Trafficking in Children for Labour Exploitation in West and Central Africa (LUTRENA) and noted, in particular, that 632 children had benefited from the project and from educational support. It requested the Government to continue providing information on the measures taken in the context of the implementation of the LUTRENA programme. The Committee noted with interest the information provided by the Government that 716 children have been intercepted and returned to their families with the support of the social, technical and financial partners, including the vigilance committees. It also noted the Government's indication that, to ensure better care for victims of trafficking and their reintegration into their families, transit centres have been equipped with facilities in the three provinces of Fada, Pama and Diapaga. The Committee also noted that financial assistance is given to families of child victims of trafficking for income-generating activities and the children are placed in workshops and various vocational training centres or reintegrated into the school system. Furthermore, the Wend Zoodo reception centre has been renovated and four literacy centres have been equipped with facilities. Finally, the Committee noted that the country is participating in phase V of the LUTRENA programme. The Committee took due note of the measures taken by the Government to remove children from sale and trafficking and to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration, which it regards as a manifestation of its political will to eliminate this worst form of child labour. The Committee strongly encourages the Government to continue its efforts and requests it to provide information on the time-bound measures taken in the context of the implementation of phase V of the LUTRENA programme to remove child victims from sale and trafficking by indicating, in particular, the number of children who have actually been removed from this worst form of labour, and on the specific rehabilitation and social integration measures taken for these children.

2. Project for small-scale gold mines in West Africa. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that Burkina Faso is participating in the ILO-IPEC project entitled "Prevention and elimination of child labour in artisanal gold mining in West Africa (2005-2008)" (the ILO-IPEC project on artisanal gold mining), the objective of which is to remove children from gold mines, while establishing structures to prevent child labour and to support local activities, particularly those aimed at enhancing the safety and boosting the income of adults working in the mines. The Committee noted that, according to the information contained in the 2007 ILO-IPEC activity report on the project in small-scale gold mines, more than 240 children had been prevented from being employed in hazardous work in gold mines and were receiving a school education.

The Committee noted with interest the detailed information provided by the Government concerning the ILO-IPEC project on artisanal gold mining which has been implemented on the gold-bearing site of Gorol Kadjè in Séno and the gold-bearing site of Ziniguima in Bam. It noted, in particular, that two small schooling programmes have been implemented which have allowed the schooling of 248 children, including 130 girls, namely 93 children on the Ziniguima site in Bam by the NGO Coalition in Burkina Faso for Children's Rights (COBUFADE) and 155 children on the Gorol Kadjè site in Séno by the NGO Action for the Promotion of Children's Rights in Burkina Faso (APRODEB). Overall, 657 children have been removed from the worst forms of labour in gold washing and have benefited from pre-school and school services, support in the form of school equipment, school clothing and afternoon snacks, and medical care. Furthermore, 16 groups of villagers have been created for income-generating activities in animal fattening, trading, dyeing and soap manufacture, including six groups of women and two groups of girls.

The Committee noted that two ILO-IPEC programmes are currently being implemented in the country, namely a programme on the rehabilitation and integration of child gold washers on the gold-bearing site of Gorol Kadjè through education and vocational training, and another which concerns support for the schooling of 310 children and the integration of 90 child workers, the protection of 120 child workers in the context of three young person clubs, support for income-generating activities for 90 mothers of gold-washing children and the mobilization of the community on the Ziniguima site. Finally, the Committee noted that a basic study on child labour in gold washing in Ziniguima and Gorol Kadjè is being carried out in the country. The Committee requests the Government to continue its efforts to remove children from the worst forms of child labour in small-scale gold mines. It also requests it to continue providing information on the time-bound measures taken, particularly in the context of the implementation of the two ILO-IPEC programmes currently under way in the country, to provide the necessary and appropriate direct assistance for the removal of children from this worst form of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration. Furthermore, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the basic study on child labour in gold washing in Ziniguima and Gorol Kadjè as soon as it has been completed.

Clause (e). Taking account of the special situation of girls. The Committee previously noted that, according to ILO-IPEC information on the LUTRENA programme, internal trafficking, which accounts for 70 per cent of cases, mainly concerns girls who are engaged in domestic labour or working as street vendors in the country's major cities. It noted that girls, particularly those employed in domestic work, are often victims of exploitation, which takes on very diverse forms, and it is difficult to monitor their conditions of employment because of the unauthorized nature of this work. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken in the context of the LUTRENA programme to protect girls against labour and sexual exploitation. The Committee noted the information provided by the Government concerning the measures it has taken in the context of the ILO-IPEC project on artisanal gold mining to take into account the situation of girls, in particular through financial assistance for income-generating activities and their insertion into training centres to learn a trade or their reintegration into the school system. The Committee noted, however, that no information is provided with regard to the measures taken in the context of the LUTRENA programme. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide information on the time-bound measures taken in the context of the implementation of phase V of the LUTRENA programme to protect girls from the worst forms of child labour, including, in particular, the number of girl victims of sale and trafficking for labour or sexual exploitation who have actually been removed from this worst form.

Article 8. International cooperation and assistance. 1. Regional cooperation. The Committee previously noted that the Government has signed bilateral cooperation agreements on the cross-border trafficking of children with the Republic of Mali and multilateral cooperation agreements on combating the trafficking of children in West Africa. It requested the Government to provide information on the implementation of these agreements. The Committee noted the Government's indication that statistics will be provided as soon as they are available. The Committee expresses the hope that the Government will be able to provide information in its next report and once again requests it to indicate whether the information exchanges with the other signatory countries have made it possible to: (1) apprehend and arrest persons operating in networks engaged in the trafficking of children; and (2) detect and intercept child victims of trafficking in the border areas.

2. Poverty elimination. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the draft Decent Work Country Programme for Burkina Faso. It noted that the problems connected with child labour form part of the priorities of this country programme, including child labour in rural areas and in mines, and that the Government intends to take measures aimed at eliminating child labour in the context of poverty reduction. The Committee noted that the Government does not provide any information on this matter. Noting once again that poverty reduction programmes contribute to breaking the poverty cycle, which is essential for the elimination of the worst forms of child labour, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in the context of the implementation of the Decent Work Country Programme to eliminate the worst forms of child labour, particularly as regards the actual reduction of poverty among child victims of sale and trafficking and those who carry out hazardous work in mines and quarries.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Burundi

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 2(1) of the Convention. Scope of application. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the indication by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) that child labour constitutes a serious problem in Burundi, particularly in agriculture and informal activities in urban areas. It also noted the statement by the Government that the socio-political crisis experienced by the country had aggravated the situation of children, some of whom were obliged to perform work "illegally" to support their families, very frequently in the informal economy and in agriculture. The Committee noted that section 3 of the Labour Code, in conjunction with section 14, prohibits work by young persons under 16 years of age in public and private enterprises, including farms, where such work is carried out on behalf of and under the supervision of an employer.

In its report, the Government confirmed that the country's regulations did not apply to the informal sector, which consequently escapes any control. Nevertheless, the question of extending the application of the labour legislation to this sector was to be discussed in a tripartite context on the occasion of the revision of the Labour Code and its implementing texts. The Committee reminded the Government that the Convention applies to all sectors of economic activity and covers all forms of employment and work, whether or not there is a contractual employment relationship, including own-account work. It once again expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to extend the scope of application of the Convention to work performed outside an employment relationship, particularly in the informal economy and in agriculture. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in this respect.

Article 2(3). Age of completion of compulsory schooling. The Committee previously noted the ITUC's indications that the war had weakened the education system due to the destruction of many schools and the death or abduction of a large number of teachers. According to the ITUC, the school attendance rate is lower and the illiteracy rate higher for girls. The Committee further noted that, according to a report of the International Bureau of Education (UNESCO) of 2004 relating to data on education, Legislative Decree No. 1/025 of 13 July 1989 reorganizing education in Burundi does not provide for free and compulsory primary education. Entry into primary education is around the age of 7 or 8 years and lasts six years. Children therefore complete primary education around the age of 13 or 14 years and then have to pass a competition to enter secondary education. The Committee further noted that in 1996 the Government had prepared a Global Plan of Action for Education designed to improve the education system, among other measures, by reducing inequalities and disparities in access to education and achieving a gross school attendance rate of 100 per cent by the year 2010.

The Committee duly noted the information provided by the Government in its report with regard to the various measures adopted in the field of education. It noted that, under article 53(2) of the Constitution of 2005, the State is under the obligation to organize public education and promote access to such education. It further noted that basic education is free of charge and that the number of children attending school tripled during the 2006 school year. In 2007, primary schools would be constructed and other mobile and temporary schools would be established. Furthermore, coordination units for girls' education had been established and over 1,000 teachers recruited. The Committee once again encourages the Government to pursue its efforts in the field of education and to provide information on the impact of the above measures in terms of increasing the school attendance rate and reducing the drop-out rate, with special attention to the situation of girls. It also requests the Government to indicate the age of completion of compulsory schooling and the provisions of the national legislation which determine this age.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Cameroon

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2001)

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy. In its previous comments, the Committee noted a communication from the General Confederation of Labour – Liberty of Cameroon (CGT–Liberté) observing that the National Plan to Combat Child Labour (National Plan) has never been formally adopted. It also noted the information from the Government that inter-ministerial consultations are being held to update and finalize the National Plan.

The Committee notes with regret the information sent by the Government in its report on the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), that the National Plan has still not been drawn up. It also notes that implementation of the Plan is to start after a legal and institutional framework has been set up. Noting that the Government has been referring since 2006 to the elaboration of the National Plan to Combat Child Labour, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the Plan is adopted and implemented at the earliest possible date. It requests the Government to provide information on progress made to this end.

Article 2(1) and Part V of the report form. Minimum age of admission to employment or work and application of the Convention in practice. The Committee noted previously that there are no exemptions for light work to the minimum age of 14 years for admission to work. It also noted that according to UNICEF statistics for the years 2000–06, 31 per cent of children aged between 5 and 14 years in Cameroon are working. It likewise noted that an ILO–IPEC action programme entitled "Survey and development of a database on child labour" started up in March 2007. According to the summary of this programme, the premature entry of children into the labour market remains a worrying phenomenon in Cameroon, among other reasons because the people live in a state of poverty. For example, a basic survey on child labour in commercial agriculture, conducted in 2004 in the major cocoa-producing areas, reveals that 30 per cent of children under 14 years of age are involved in cocoa-production activities. The summary nonetheless indicates that there is a lack of statistical data on child labour problems in Cameroon and that most statistical sources were not designed to deal specifically with child labour. Consequently, in 2007 the Government conducted a modular survey on child labour, through the National Institute of Statistics (INS), the aim being to compile a fuller survey with nationwide coverage.

The Committee notes that the Government has provided some of the statistics compiled by the National Report on Child Labour in Cameroon conducted by the INS in cooperation with ILO–IPEC and published in December 2008. The results of this survey show that in 2007, 41 per cent of children aged from 5–17 years – i.e. 2,441,181 – work in Cameroon. The report indicates that children’s participation in economic activities increases with age and that 51 per cent of the 10–14 age group is engaged in work. Of the economically active 5–17 year-olds, 85.2 per cent are used in agriculture, fisheries, forestry and harvesting, and 4.4 per cent in hazardous work. Furthermore, 79.3 per cent of working children are employed in unpaid jobs as family workers. The Committee notes the information supplied by the Government to the effect that no reports by the inspection services refer to the use of children in enterprises. The Committee again expresses its deep concern at the large number of children under 14 years of age in Cameroon who work and accordingly urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that work by children under the minimum age for admission to employment is effectively abolished, in particular by stepping up labour inspection in the informal economy.

Article 2(3). Age of completion of compulsory schooling. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that there are no legal or regulatory provisions establishing the age for compulsory schooling. It also noted that according to the 2006 Multiple Indicator Cluster Survey conducted by the INS in collaboration with UNICEF, around 44 per cent of children who have reached the statutory age of entry to the first year of primary school, i.e. six years, are actually enrolled. The survey also indicates that the net primary school attendance rate is 64 per cent for 6 year-olds and that it gradually increases with age, reaching 90 per cent for 11 year-olds. Furthermore, 35 per cent of children of secondary school age are still in primary school. The Committee also noted that only 38 per cent of children aged between 12 and 18 attend a secondary or higher education establishment.

The Committee notes the information from the Government to the effect that the age of completion of compulsory education is 14 years and that primary schooling is free. It also notes the information supplied by the Government in the report it submitted to the Committee on the Rights of the Child on 3 April 2008 (CRC/C/CMR/2, paragraph 204), that a sectoral education strategy to help facilitate access to education for young girls was adopted in 2002. Various measures have been taken in this context to promote literacy and increase the enrolment of girls (CRC/C/CMR/2, paragraphs 204–205). The report also indicates that school aid is provided to destitute children and children from indigent families (CRC/C/CMR/2, paragraph 195).

The Committee takes due note of the measures taken by the Government in the field of education. It observes, however, that according to the UNESCO statistics for 2008, the situation remains worrying. For example, 12 per cent of children of compulsory schooling age do not attend school and the primary school repeat rate is 17 per cent. The Committee further notes that according to UNESCO’s Education For All Global Monitoring Report 2009, in Cameroon children who work suffer a 30–67 per cent disadvantage in terms of school attendance. The National Report on Child Labour in Cameroon reveals that up to the age of 14 educational retardation and school dropout rates are higher among children performing work to be abolished than among other children. It also indicates that 39.8 per cent of children between 10 and 14 years of age study and work at the same time. The Committee further notes that in its concluding observations of February 2010 (CRC/C/CMR/CO/2, paragraph 65), the Committee on the Rights of the Child expressed concern at the low budgetary allocation for education and the significant gender and regional disparities in access to education, particularly in the Far North, North, Adamaoua, East and Southern regions. The Committee also notes the concern expressed by the Committee on the Rights of the Child at the insufficient number of trained teachers, the poor quality of education and the lack of learning materials and equipment. Considering that compulsory education is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, the Committee urges the Government to redouble its efforts to improve the running of the education system so as to allow children under 14 years of age access to basic compulsory schooling, particularly in the most affected regions of the country. It also asks the Government to provide information on progress made in this respect and on results obtained, particularly under the sectoral education strategy. The Committee also asks the Government to indicate the provisions of national laws or regulations that prescribe the age of completion of compulsory schooling.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2002)

The Committee notes the Government’s reply to the communication of the General Confederation of Labour–Liberty of Cameroon (CGT–Liberté), dated 17 October 2008, and the Government’s report.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clauses (b) and (c). Use, procuring or offering of a child for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances and for illicit activities. In its previous comments the Committee noted that Cameroon’s legislation did not appear to contain provisions prohibiting the use, procuring or offering of children under 18 years of age for the production of pornography or pornographic performances. It further noted that Act No. 2005/015 of 20 December 2005, to combat the trafficking of children, contains no provisions expressly prohibiting the use, procuring or offering of children for illicit activities.

The Committee notes the Government’s information that these prohibitions will be taken into account in the draft Child Protection Code. It notes with regret that this Code has been in the process of adoption since 2006. The Committee reminds the Government that, according to Article 3(b) and (c) of the Convention, the use, procuring or offering of a child for the production of pornography or pornographic performances and for illicit activities are considered as the worst forms of child labour and that, according to Article 1, immediate and effective measures must be taken as a matter of urgency to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour. Consequently, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that the Child Protection Code is adopted in the near future and that it contains provisions prohibiting the use, procuring or offering of children under 18 years of age for the production of pornography or pornographic performances, and the use, procuring or offering of persons under 18 years of age for illicit activities, including the production and trafficking of drugs, as defined in the relevant international Conventions. Provision must also be made for penalties for the abovementioned offences. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard and to provide a copy of the Code as soon as it has been adopted.

Articles 5 and 7(1). Monitoring mechanisms and sanctions. Law enforcement agencies. The Committee noted previously that a vice squad had been established at the Interpol National Central Bureau (NCB-Interpol) in Yaoundé. It also noted that, in addition to the monitoring carried out by the vice squad, a telephone number has been made available to encourage the public to report abuse anonymously, and NCB-Interpol has set up a round-the-clock answering service to receive the calls. Furthermore, three contact officers are on permanent standby to carry out investigations. The Committee nonetheless noted CGT-Liberté's comment on the absence of any extracts from reports or documents regarding the operation of the vice squad.

The Committee notes the Government's reply to CGT-Liberté's observation that the vice squad is operating well but, for security reasons, no information can be disclosed. It further notes from the information in the Government's report that extracts of the vice squad's report will be sent to the Office later. The Government also states in its report that it has no information on the exact number of children identified as victims of trafficking by the NCB-Interpol reporting system or on police investigations. The Committee notes, however, from a report entitled "2008 Findings on the Worst Forms of Child Labour", published on the website of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (www.unhcr.org), that the police arrested three traffickers attempting to traffic seven children for the purpose of labour exploitation. According to the same report, the Government of Cameroon has made an effort to monitor its borders for trafficking. However, the Committee notes the information in a report entitled "Trafficking in Persons Report 2010 – Cameroon", also published on the website of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (www.unhcr.org), that the Government of Cameroon did not show evidence of increasing efforts to convict and punish trafficking offenders or to identify and protect victims of trafficking. In the course of the reporting period, the authorities conducted investigations into 26 cases of human trafficking, none of which resulted in a prosecution. The report also indicates that there were signs of some officials' involvement in trafficking. Furthermore, judges, law enforcement officials and social workers do not enforce Act No. 2005/015 because they are unfamiliar with it. Indeed, there is no system to provide them with copies of new laws. The Committee further notes that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations of 18 February 2010 (CRC/C/CMR/CO/2, paragraph 75), expressed regret at the low level of enforcement and implementation of Act No. 2005/015, as well as the lack of data and remedial action. The Committee expresses its deep concern at the low level of enforcement of Act No. 2005/015 and at the allegations of involvement of law enforcement officials in human trafficking. The Committee urges the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure that anyone engaging in the sale and trafficking of children under the age of 18 and any state official involved in such acts is prosecuted and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions are applied in practice. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that thorough investigations and robust prosecutions of offenders are carried out, in particular by building the capacity of law enforcement agencies through the dissemination of Act No. 2005/015. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to this end and on the results obtained, particularly in terms of the number of investigations and prosecutions carried out.

Article 6. Programmes of action. In its previous comments the Committee noted the completion of the LUTRENA project in Cameroon and accordingly asked the Government to take steps to secure the adoption of a national policy to combat the trafficking of children for the purpose of exploiting their labour, in accordance with the recommendations in the study carried out by ILO-IPEC-LUTRENA in 2005.

The Committee notes that the Government has sent no information on this matter. It notes, however, from the Government's second report to the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC/C/CMR/2, paragraphs 222 and 223) that the Government refers to a national plan of action to combat child labour and trafficking in children and a plan of action to combat the sexual exploitation of children, which were drawn up in October 2005. The Committee further notes that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations (CRC/C/CMR/CO/2, paragraph 73) of 18 February 2010, welcomed the approval in July 2009 of the National Plan to Combat Trafficking and Sexual Exploitation. The Committee accordingly requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken under the National Plan to Combat Trafficking and Sexual Exploitation adopted in July 2009, and to provide a copy of this Plan.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour, removing them from these forms of child labour and ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration. 1. Sale and trafficking of children. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's replies to CGT-Liberté's observations stating that there are many reception, transit and accommodation centres in various parts of the country and that the territorial officers have always set up ad hoc transit and accommodation centres when they have to deal with a convoy of trafficked persons. It also notes the information in the Government's report that there is a plan to set up a national network for combating the trafficking of children and child labour, made up of representatives of the various state authorities, as part of the transfer of ownership of the WACAP and LUTRENA projects, now under way.

The Committee notes the information in the Trafficking in Persons Report 2010 that the system for referring the victims of trafficking to transit and shelter facilities involves cumbersome administrative procedures. The report also states that in August 2009 the Ministry of Social Affairs began working with UNICEF to draft a manual that would show well-respected families in local communities how to create foster homes that provide shelter, food, health care and education to trafficking victims. This new system to protect such victims through the provision of foster care is to start up in 2010. The Committee further notes that in its written replies to the list of issues raised by the Committee on the Rights of the Child in its examination of the second periodic report (CRC/C/CMR/Q/2/Add.1, paragraph 59), the Government places action to combat the trafficking and exploitation of children among its urgent and high priority issues. The Committee requests the Government to redouble its efforts to prevent children under 18 years of age from falling victim to sale and trafficking and to remove them from these worst forms of child labour, taking care in particular to simplify the administrative procedure for placing child victims of trafficking in transit and shelter facilities. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the number of children actually removed from this worst form of child labour and placed in transit and shelter facilities and foster families. It further asks the Government to provide information on the rehabilitation and social integration measures taken to provide child victims of sale and trafficking with access to free basic education and occupational training. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the implementation and functioning of the national network to combat the trafficking of children.

2. Hazardous work and exploitation of child labour in cocoa plantations. The Committee noted previously that a system to monitor child labour in plantations has been set up and that a number of children were prevented from working on cocoa plantations or withdrawn from such work under the WACAP project. Noting that the WACAP project had ended in Cameroon, it asked the Government to take steps to follow up on these prevention and withdrawal measures, particularly for children working on cocoa plantations.

The Committee notes the Government's information that, under the WACAP and LUTRENA projects, 5,413 children were rescued from trafficking. Noting that the Government's report contains no information on the follow-up to the WACAP project, it urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures to prevent children under 18 years of age from working in cocoa plantations and to have them withdrawn therefrom. It also asks the Government to take measures for their rehabilitation and social reintegration, in particular, by affording them access to free compulsory basic education and to vocational training. Lastly, it asks the Government to supply detailed information on the measures taken to this end and on the results obtained.

Clause (d). Children at special risk. 1. HIV/AIDS orphans. In its previous comments the Committee noted that according to the UNAIDS 2008 Report on the Global AIDS Epidemic, the number of children orphaned because of HIV/AIDS appeared to have increased to 300,000 in 2007. It accordingly asked the Government to step up efforts to prevent the employment of children in the worst forms of child labour.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report to the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC/C/CMR/2, paragraph 31) of April 2008 that, with the involvement of the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria, an initiative under the authority of the Ministry of Social Affairs aims to provide access for 300,000 orphans and vulnerable children (OVCs) to basic social services by 2010. It notes, however, from the same report that the Government has noted an aggravation of the HIV/AIDS pandemic, which has resulted in an increase in the number of OVCs. Indeed, in its report of March 2010 submitted in the context of follow-up to the Declaration of Commitment on HIV/AIDS, the Government indicates that in 2009 there were 327,600 HIV/AIDS orphans in Cameroon. It further notes that efforts undertaken remain insufficient, and that the promotion of education for OVCs must be continued. The Committee also notes that, in its concluding observations (CRC/C/CMR/CO/2, paragraph 45), the Committee on the Rights of the Child expressed concern about the limited availability of residential care facilities and other forms of alternative care for abandoned children and orphans, as well as the limited quality of care in institutions. It likewise expressed concern about the lack of an adequate policy and insufficient human, technical and financial resources for alternative care. Expressing its concern at the increase in the number of HIV/AIDS orphans, the Committee urges the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure that children orphaned by HIV/AIDS are not engaged in the worst forms of child labour. It asks the Government to provide information on the measures taken and the results obtained under the National Programme for Support to Orphans and Vulnerable Children (PNS-OVC), with particular reference to the provision of access to free compulsory basic education for OVCs.

2. Street children. Further to its previous comments, the Committee takes note of the statistics sent by the Government in its report showing that, between 2008 and 2009, 904 street children of 4 to 18 years of age were identified by the Yaoundé and Douala social centres. Of the 469 children identified in 2009, 119 were returned to families, 63 were enrolled in school and 62 were placed in institutions. The Committee notes the information supplied by the Government in its report of April 2008 to the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC/C/CMR/2, paragraphs 233 and 235) that in Cameroon there are 10,000 children living and/or working in the streets countrywide, particularly in big cities such as Yaoundé, Douala and Ngaoundéré. It further notes that, in its written replies to the list of issues raised by the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC/C/CMR/Q/2/Add.1, paragraph 59), the Government places action to combat the street children phenomenon among the issues it deems to be of high priority and in need of urgent attention. Furthermore, according to information given by the Government to the Committee on the Rights of the Child, a new project to combat the phenomenon of street children is scheduled to start up in March 2010. Considering that street children are particularly exposed to the worst forms of child labour, the Committee encourages the Government to pursue its effort to identify, withdraw and reintegrate street children. It asks the Government to provide information on the measures taken and the results obtained under the project to combat the phenomenon of street children.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes the statistics published in the National Report on Child Labour in Cameroon conducted by the National Institute of Statistics (INS) in cooperation with ILO-IPEC and published in December 2008. The results of the abovementioned survey show that in 2007 2,441,181 children aged between 5 and 17 years (41 per cent) worked in Cameroon. The report also shows that 266,594 children (4.4 per cent) in this age group are affected by hazardous work. Furthermore, the percentage is nearly twice as high in urban as in rural areas and the phenomenon is particularly marked in cities such as Douala and Yaoundé. The Committee also notes that, according to the report on the worst forms of child labour, most working children are to be found in the urban informal sector. The Committee nonetheless observes that, among the worst forms of child labour, only hazardous work is dealt with by the National Report on Child Labour. It takes note of the concern expressed by the Committee on the Rights of the Child in its concluding observations (CRC/C/CMR/CO/2, paragraph 19) about the lack of reliable data, inter alia, on street children and child victims of trafficking or sexual exploitation. The Committee expresses deep concern at the number of children employed in hazardous work and accordingly urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure that children are protected from this worst form of child labour in practice. It also asks the Government to provide statistics on the nature, extent and trends of worst forms of child labour, particularly as regards the sale and trafficking of children and street children. It further requests the Government to provide information on the number and nature of offences reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions applied. To the extent possible, all information provided should be disaggregated by sex and age.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Central African Republic

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy and the application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted a study by the Ministry of the Economy, Planning and International Cooperation of 2003 on the situation of children in the country. According to this study, 5.2 per cent of boys and 5.6 per cent of girls between the ages of 6 and 9 years are engaged in work. The study also shows that boys work, in particular, in the private wage sector (boys account for 68.5 per cent of children working in this sector), the para-public wage sector (66.7 per cent), for an employer (72.7 per cent) and as apprentices (60.2 per cent), while the number of girls is greater in own-account work (girls account for 56.9 per cent of children working in this sector) or as family helpers (53.5 per cent). The Committee also noted the Government's indication that a study to identify and classify types of child labour, carried out in collaboration with UNICEF, was in the process of being validated.

The Committee noted that, according to UNICEF statistics for 2007, 57 per cent of children between the ages of 5 and 14 years are engaged in work in the Central African Republic (44 per cent of boys and 49 per cent of girls). It noted the Government's indication that, in the context of the adoption of the new Act No. 09.004 issuing the Labour Code of the Central African Republic in January 2009 (Labour Code of 2009), the Labour Department has worked on the preparation of texts to implement the Code. The Government indicated that a national policy for the progressive abolition of child labour and to increase the minimum age for admission to employment or work will be prepared once the implementing texts have been issued. The Committee expressed once again its deep concern at the situation of young children who work in the country out of personal necessity. It therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the national policy for the progressive abolition of child labour is adopted in the very near future and that programmes of action are implemented in the sectors in which child labour is the most problematic. It requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the progress achieved in this respect. It also once again requests the Government to provide a copy of the study to identify and classify child labour.

Article 2(1). Scope of application and minimum age for admission to employment or work. Self-employed work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the information provided by the Government that most children are used in the sectors of the informal economy, such as diamond workshops, portage or diving in search of diamonds. The Government indicated that the juvenile courts and the Children's Parliament guarantee the protection envisaged by the Convention with respect to children engaged in an economic activity on their own account. The Committee noted that the Labour Code of 2009 is not applicable to self-employed workers (section 2), but only governs professional relationships between workers and employers derived from labour contracts (section 1). Noting that the Government's report does not contain any information on this subject, the Committee requests it once again to provide information on the manner in which the juvenile courts and the Children's Parliament ensure the application of the protection envisaged by the Convention in respect of children who work without an employment relationship, in particular when they work on their own account or in the informal economy. In this respect, it once again requests the Government to envisage the possibility of adopting measures to adapt and strengthen the labour inspection services so as to secure this protection.

Family enterprises. The Committee noted previously that, under section 2 of Order No. 006 of 21 May 1986 determining the conditions of employment of young workers, the types of work and the categories of enterprises that are prohibited for young persons and the age limit up to which this prohibition applies (Order No. 006 of 1986), children under 14 years of age may be employed, even as apprentices, in establishments in which only family members are engaged. The Committee noted that section 166 of the Labour Code of 2009 provides that no one may be apprenticed who is not at least 14 years of age. Furthermore, section 259 provides that children may not be employed in any enterprise, even as apprentices, before the age of 14 years, unless an exception is issued by order of the minister responsible for labour taking into account the opinion of the National Standing Labour Council. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether exceptions have been authorized by the minister responsible for labour under section 259 of the Labour Code of 2009.

Article 2(3). Age of completion of compulsory schooling. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the age of completion of compulsory schooling is 14 years. It also noted the Government's indication to the Committee on the Rights of the Child that, pursuant to section 6 of Act No. 97/014 of 10 December 1997 respecting education policy, school attendance is compulsory from 5 to 15 years and that the texts to be issued under this Act are being prepared. The Committee also noted the adoption of the Plan of Action on Education for All (NPA-EFA) in 2005, the objective of which is to increase the school attendance rate, reduce the school drop-out rate and ensure the completion of the full cycle of primary education by all children. The Committee further noted that, according to UNICEF statistics for 2006, the net school enrolment rate for primary education was 44 per cent for boys and 37 per cent for girls, while the figures for secondary education were 13 per cent for boys and 9 per cent for girls. The Committee also noted that, according to the Education for All Global Monitoring Report 2008, published by UNESCO under the title "Education for All in 2015: Will we make it?", in view of the lack of data, it was impossible to make projections for the achievement of the goals established by the NPA-EFA for the Central African Republic for 2015. However, the study indicates that 20 per cent or more of primary school students are repeating their grade and that girls repeat grades more than boys.

The Committee observed that, according to UNICEF statistics for 2007, the school attendance rates at the primary and secondary levels remain a matter of great concern: the net enrolment rate at primary school is 53 per cent for boys and 38 per cent for girls, and the figures for secondary education are 13 per cent for boys and 9 per cent for girls. The Committee, however, noted that the Government has not provided any information on this subject in its report. The Committee therefore once again expressed its deep concern at the low rate of school enrolment in both primary and secondary education, and particularly at the disparity between the two sexes, to the detriment of girls, and the fairly high rate of repeating school years, which affects girls in particular. It once again observed that poverty is one of the primary causes of child labour and that, when combined with a deficient educational system, it prevents the development of the child. Considering that compulsory education is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to improve the functioning of the education system in the country so as to enable children to attend compulsory basic education or to be integrated into an informal school system. In this respect, it once again requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted in the context of the NPA-EFA of 2005 to increase the school enrolment rate and reduce the school drop-out rate, so as to prevent children under 14 years of age from working. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the results achieved. Finally, the Committee once again asks the Government to provide a copy of Act No. 97/014 of 10 December 1997 on education policy.

Article 3(1) and (2). Minimum age for admission to hazardous types of work and determination of these types of work. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee noted that, under the terms of section 263 of the Labour Code of 2009, the worst forms of child labour, that is work by any person under 18 years of age (section 3), are prohibited throughout the Central African Republic. Section 262 provides that the worst forms of child labour include work which, by its nature or the circumstances in which it is carried out, is likely to harm the health, safety or morals of children. The Committee noted the Government's indication in its report that section 261 of the Labour Code of 2009 provides that a joint order of the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Public Health, issued taking into account the opinion of the National Standing Labour Council, shall determine the nature of the types of work and the categories of enterprises prohibited for children and the age limit up to which this prohibition applies. The Committee however observed that no list of these hazardous types of employment or work appears to have been published up to now. The Committee reminded the Government that, by virtue of Article 3(2) of the Convention, the hazardous types of employment or work shall be determined by national laws or regulations or by the competent authority, after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that a list determining the hazardous types of employment or work that are prohibited for persons under 18 years of age, in accordance with section 261 of the Labour Code of 2009, is adopted in the near future. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress achieved in this respect.

Article 9(3). Keeping of registers by employers. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee noted that, under the terms of section 331 of the Labour Code of 2009, the employer shall always keep an up to date employment register, the first part of which shall contain data relating to the persons and the contracts of all workers engaged in the enterprise. The employment register has to be kept at the disposal of labour inspectors, who may require its production at any time. However, the Committee noted that section 331 also provides that certain enterprises or establishments, as well as certain categories of enterprises or establishments, may be exempted from the obligation to keep an employment register by reason of their situation, their small size or the nature of their activity, by order of the Ministry of Labour, issued taking into account the views of the National Standing Labour Council. The Committee once again reminded the Government that Article 9(3) of the Convention does not envisage such exceptions. Noting that the Labour Code of 2009 has not taken this issue into account, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that all employers are required to keep a register indicating the names and ages or dates of birth, duly certified wherever possible, of persons employed by them or working for them who are under 18 year of age. It requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the progress achieved in this respect.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. Forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict. The Committee previously noted that the Secretary-General of the United Nations, in his report of 21 December 2007 on children and armed conflict (A/62/609-S/2007/757, paragraphs 29–32), referred to many cases of the recruitment of children by the rebel group Union des forces démocratiques pour le rassemblement (UFDR), which controls parts of the north-east of the country. During UFDR attacks on the positions of the armed forces of the Central African Republic (FACA) and the French army in Birao in March 2007, former students of the Birao secondary school were identified among the rebels. Many of the children between the ages of 12 and 17 years who participated in these attacks lost their lives. Furthermore, according to the report, a UNICEF mission in June 2007 confirmed that there were approximately 400 to 500 children associated with the rebel groups of the Armée pour la restauration de la République et la démocratie (APRD) and the Front démocratique du peuple centrafricain (FDPC), which were participating in operations in the north-western region. The APRD and the FDPC are increasingly resorting to the forced recruitment of children in their areas of influence. The Committee noted in this respect that the national legislation does not appear to contain provisions prohibiting and penalizing the forced recruitment of young persons under 18 years of age for use in armed conflict and it therefore requested the Government to take measures as a matter of urgency for the adoption of such legislation.

The Committee noted with satisfaction that sections 262 and 263 of the new Act No. 09.004 issuing the Labour Code of the Central African Republic (Labour Code of 2009), adopted in January 2009, provide that all forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery affecting young persons under 18 years of age, as well as forced or compulsory labour, including forced or compulsory recruitment for their use in armed conflict, are prohibited throughout the territory of the Central African Republic. The Committee further noted that fines and terms of imprisonment are envisaged in the event of violations of this provision (section 393).

However, the Committee noted that, according to more recent information provided by the Secretary-General of the United Nations in his Report of 3 February 2009 on children and armed conflict (S/2009/66, paragraphs 26 to 36), the APRD recently identified 250 children for release and reintegration, but it may well be that the children associated with the APRD are more numerous. In November 2008, 100 children had been identified, most of whom were between the ages of 12 to 17 years, with some cases of children of 9 and 10 years of age. The Secretary-General also reports that many children were abducted and recruited in the south-west of the country following the four attacks by the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) in February and March 2008 on villages in the Obo area. A joint mission of the United Nations, the United Nations Peace Building Support Office in the Central African Republic, the Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs, the Department of Safety and Security and UNICEF found that some of the attackers were reportedly under the age of 15 years. According to 35 adults who had been abducted and were later released by the LRA, the 55 children who were abducted during the attacks are now used as soldiers or for auxiliary tasks, and the girls are used as sexual slaves. The Committee further noted that the Representative of the Secretary-General in his Report on the situation of human rights of internally displaced persons of 17 March 2008 (A/HRC/8/6/Add.1, paragraph 67), indicates that he observed children among the rebels patrolling the territories under their control and that something under 1,000 children are reported to be involved.

The Committee further noted the indication by the Secretary-General that an Amnesty Law was promulgated on 13 October 2008 covering violations committed by Government security and defence forces and rebels between March 2003 and October 2008 (S/2009/66, paragraph 6). The amnesty is subject to conditions, including the cantonment, demobilization and disarmament of fighting forces within 60 days of its promulgation. Considering this short timeframe, which was challenged in particular by the APRD, an incremental approach was adopted early in November 2008, with demobilization activities to begin early in 2009. On 25 October 2008, the Government of the Central African Republic released from detention 12 fighters from the APRD, the UFDR and the FDPC, in accordance with its obligations under the agreement (S/2009/66, paragraph 6).

The Committee accordingly observed that the forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict still exists in the country and that the situation remains fragile. It once again expressed deep concern at the current situation, particularly since the persistence of this worst form of child labour gives rise to other violations of the rights of the child, such as murders and sexual violence. It once again reminded the Government that, under the terms of Article 1 of the Convention, member States are under the obligation to take immediate and effective measures to secure the elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take immediate and effective measures to bring an end to the practice of the forced recruitment of young persons under 18 years of age by armed groups, particularly in the north-east and north-west of the country. With reference to the Security Council, which in resolution No. 1612 of 26 July 2005 recalls "the responsibilities of States to end impunity and to prosecute those responsible for genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and other egregious crimes perpetrated against children", the Committee urges the Government to take immediate measures to secure in practice the protection of young persons under 18 years of age against forced recruitment for their use in armed conflict, and to ensure that investigations are undertaken and grave charges brought against those committing violations, and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed upon persons found guilty of having used young persons under 18 years of age in armed conflict. It requests the Government to provide information in this respect.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (b) and (c). Direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and to ensure their access to free basic education and, wherever possible and appropriate, to vocational training. Child soldiers. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to information from UNICEF, the Government, the UFDR and UNICEF signed an agreement on 16 June 2007 to reintegrate children connected with armed groups in the north-east of the country. In this respect, it noted that, according to the Report of the Secretary-General of the United Nations of 21 December 2007 on children and armed conflict (A/62/609-S/2007/757, paragraphs 29 to 32), in the context of an agreement signed on 16 June 2007, a first group of approximately 200 children were released. In April and May 2007, over 450 children associated with the UFDR, 75 per cent of whom were boys aged between 13 and 17 years, were demobilized. According to the report, a last group of between 450 and 500 children are reported to have been released and to have returned to their communities since September 2007, although this information has not been verified. With regard to children associated with the APRD and FDPC rebel groups, which are both active in the north-western region, the report indicates that in March and June 2007 the APRD requested assistance from the United Nations Country Team to demobilize child soldiers. An informal dialogue was commenced with the APRD to prevent the recruitment of children and to demobilize and reintegrate those who are in its ranks with a view to their reintegration into society. However, formal negotiations are hampered by the insecurity in the north-western region of the country.

The Committee further noted that, according to the UNICEF Humanitarian Action Report 2008, the conflict has resulted in internal displacements, with over 610,000 suffering from the conflict. The Committee also noted that UNICEF intends to improve access to basic education for 113,000 conflict-affected children through an extensive back-to-school campaign across the country's northern prefectures. UNICEF also intends to facilitate the reintegration of 1,000 child soldiers into their families and communities.

The Committee noted that, according to the Report of the Secretary-General of the United Nations of 3 February 2009 on children and armed conflict (S/2009/66, paragraph 53), strategic partnerships for the prevention of the recruitment and for the release and reintegration of children in areas controlled by the APRD and the UFDR have recently been concluded with four humanitarian NGOs. This community-based programme envisages support for the release and reintegration of hundreds of children associated with armed groups in the northern areas. Three transit interim care centres are currently being built in the north-western districts and an emergency site to receive released children is already operational in the north-west. The Committee however noted the indication by the Secretary-General that, while there have been some positive developments regarding the anticipated release of children from the APRD and the UFDR, the deadlock in the peace negotiations and the withdrawal of the major parties to the conflict from the Comprehensive Peace Dialogue in August 2008 stalled the implementation of the commitments to release children. According to the Secretary-General, up to now, relatively few children have actually been released and there may also have been new recruitment.

The Committee therefore once again observed that, despite the Government's collaboration with UNICEF, the current situation of the country remains a cause of grave concern. The Committee therefore requests the Government to redouble its efforts and to continue its collaboration with UNICEF and other organizations with a view to improving the situation of child victims of forced recruitment who are used in armed conflict. It hopes that the Government will negotiate an end to armed conflict so that all children used in armed conflict are demobilized and reintegrated, particularly in the north-east and north-west of the country. The Committee further asks the Government to provide information on the number of child soldiers removed from armed groups and reintegrated through appropriate assistance for their rehabilitation and social integration, including through care centres. It requests the Government to provide information in this respect in its next report.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. Forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee noted that, under section 14 of Ordinance No. 01/PCE/CEDNACVG of 16 January 1991 reorganizing the armed forces of Chad [Ordinance No. 1 of 16 January 1991], the age of recruitment is 18 years for volunteers and 20 years for conscripts.

The Committee noted that, according to the report of the United Nations Secretary-General of 7 August 2008 on children and armed conflict in Chad (S/2008/532, for the period July 2007–June 2008), the political, military and security situation in the country remains highly volatile, owing to the continuation of armed conflict between the Chad armed forces and armed rebel groups, the presence in eastern Chad of foreign rebel groups, cross-border raids by the Janjaweed militia and continuing inter-ethnic tensions. The Committee noted that, according to the Secretary-General's report, the Government of Chad and the three main rebel groups, namely the Union des forces pour la démocratie et le développement (UFDD), the Rassemblement des forces pour le changement (RFC) and the Concorde nationale tchadienne (CNT), signed a peace agreement on 25 October 2007 which provided for an immediate ceasefire. However, despite the signature of this agreement, fighting has continued and all the parties concerned have continued to recruit and use children in the conflict.

The Committee noted that the Secretary-General's Report showed that the forced recruitment and use of child soldiers in the conflict in Chad is related to the regional dimension of the conflict. The Toroboro or Sudanese armed groups allied with the Government of Chad are recruiting children from two refugee camps, at Tréguine and Bredjing, during the rainy season. Furthermore, heavy recruitment also occurs on the basis of needs in Darfur. The Sudanese rebel movement Justice and Equality Movement (JEM) continues to recruit in and around refugee camps, notably Oure Cassoni (Bahai). According to information in the Secretary-General's report, between 7,000 and 10,000 children are associated with the armed forces and armed groups. The Committee noted that the Working Group on Children and Armed Conflict, in its conclusions of December 2008 (S/AC.51/2008/15), expressed grave concern that all parties to the conflict continue to recruit and use children and called for measures to be taken to prosecute the perpetrators and put an end to impunity.

The Committee noted that the situation in Chad has been unstable for many years and that it remains fragile. The Committee also noted that, despite the fact that Ordinance No. 1 of 16 January 1991 provides that the age of recruitment is 18 years for volunteers and 20 years for conscripts, the recruitment of children for use in armed conflict is continuing in practice. In this regard, it noted that no penalties are laid down for violations of this prohibition. The Committee expressed deep concern at the current situation, especially as the persistence of the worst forms of child labour leads to other violations of the rights of the child, such as abduction, death and sexual violence. It reminded the Government that under Article 3(a) of the Convention, the forced or compulsory recruitment of children under 18 years of age for use in armed conflict is considered to be one of the worst forms of child labour and that, under Article 1 of the Convention, members States must take immediate and effective measures to secure the elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures as a matter of urgency to stop in practice the forced recruitment of children under 18 years of age by armed forces and groups and immediately undertake the full demobilization of all children. With reference to Security Council resolution 1612 of 26 July 2005, which recalls the "responsibilities of States to end impunity and to prosecute those responsible for genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and other egregious crimes perpetrated against children", the Committee urges the Government to take immediate steps to ensure that perpetrators are investigated and prosecuted and that penalties which are sufficiently effective and dissuasive are imposed on persons found guilty of recruiting and using children under 18 years of age in armed conflict. It requests the Government to supply information in this respect.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (b) and (c). Direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration, including access to free basic education and vocational training. Children who have been enlisted and used in armed conflict. Further to its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to the report of the United Nations Secretary-General of 7 August 2008 on children and armed conflict in Chad (S/2008/532), the Government of Chad signed an agreement with UNICEF on 9 May 2007 to ensure the release and sustainable reintegration of all child soldiers associated with armed forces and groups in the country. According to the Secretary-General's report, since the agreement was signed, 512 child soldiers have been released to UNICEF, which has provided support at five transit centres. So far 265 children have voluntarily returned to or been reunited with their families, and 220 have been placed in schools and 85 in professional activities. Most of the demobilized children were associated with non-governmental armed groups. Very few children associated with the Chadian armed forces have been released. According to the Secretary-General's report, negotiations are under way for placing the demobilized children in vocational training institutions and providing them with gainful employment. Some NGOs which are partners of UNICEF are currently working on the reintegration programme. Moreover, the encouraging start of disarmament, demobilization and reintegration activities in Chad is likely to lead to the release of another estimated 2,500 children associated with armed forces and groups.

The Committee also noted that, according to the Secretary-General's report, Chad undertook to release as a matter of priority children associated with armed groups held in detention. Moreover, it decided that an inter-ministerial task force would be established to coordinate and ensure effective reintegration of children. The Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations of February 2009 (CRC/C/TDC/CO/2, paragraph 71), urged the Government to take the necessary measures immediately to facilitate contact between armed groups operating in Chad and the United Nations in order to promote the demobilization of children and prevent the recruitment of children, particularly in refugee camps. In this regard, the Committee on the Rights of the Child urges the Government to extend the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration programme, placing particular emphasis on the demobilization and reintegration of girls.

The Committee noted the measures taken by the Government to demobilize and reintegrate child soldiers, particularly through collaboration with UNICEF. It noted, however, that the current situation in the country remains a source of concern. The Committee therefore requests the Government to intensify its efforts and continue its collaboration with UNICEF and other organizations in order to improve the situation of child victims of forced recruitment for use in armed conflict. Moreover, the Committee requests the Government to take effective and time-bound measures to ensure that child soldiers removed from armed forces and groups receive adequate assistance for their rehabilitation and social integration, including reintegration into the school system or vocational training, wherever possible and appropriate. It requests the Government to supply information in this respect.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes the Government's report and the communication of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 1 September 2010.

Article 2(3) of the Convention. 1. Compulsory schooling. The Committee previously noted that the law fails to guarantee funding for compulsory education, thus forcing or allowing many schools, particularly in rural regions, to collect tuition and other fees. However, the Committee noted that in 2007, the State Council made more funds available for rural compulsory schooling including providing tuition to all rural students of compulsory school age and increased subsidies to boarding school students from poor rural families. The Committee also noted that the Compulsory Education Law states that no miscellaneous fees should be charged for compulsory education and that the State Education Inspection and Supervision Group is responsible for monitoring the enforcement of the Law. The Committee noted that these measures resulted in a rise in the level of universal education across the country. However, the Committee noted the information in the UNESCO Education for All: Global Monitoring Report of 2008 that a well-structured inspection system on quality education was still in the early stages of development (2008/ED/EFA/MRT/PI/82, page 8).

The Committee notes the information in the communication submitted by the ITUC of 1 September 2010 which indicates that, in March 2010, a new ten-year reform plan for the overhaul and improvement of the education system began. Nonetheless, the ITUC states that, according to statistics from the China Education and Research Network, the number of overall primary schools has decreased, as has enrolment at both the primary and secondary levels. The ITUC also refers to UNICEF figures indicating that approximately 1 million children drop out of school each year due to poverty (particularly ethnic minorities and girls) and that two-thirds of non-enrolled school-age children in China are females. The ITUC states that girls are the first to drop out when economic pressures affect their families, and that girls are more often found to be working in factories. The ITUC indicates that the increase in drop-outs, and the corresponding increase in child workers, are due to increasing school fees. The ITUC's allegations reference cases where children were brought to work in factories by their parents in order to pay for their school fees.

The Committee also notes the information contained in the Government's report that the net entrance rate for primary school has increased to 99.54 per cent. The Government also indicates that since the autumn 2008 semester, urban students have been exempted from tuition and incidental fees for compulsory education, similar to the programme operating in rural areas. Students whose families are entitled to minimum living standards are given free textbooks and boarding school students receive livelihood subsidies. The Government further indicates that the balanced development of compulsory education within regions is a strategic focus for the Government that it aims to achieve by 2020. In this regard, the Committee notes that in 2010, the Government issued the "National Mid- and Long-Term Reform on Education and Development Programme (2010–20)", which includes specific compulsory education targets, measures to increase the guaranteed level of resource funds and initiatives to raise the quality of education at all levels. In addition, the Government indicates that various local governments have taken steps to improve access to education in rural areas, such as increasing the infrastructure of rural schools, minimizing gaps in the conditions between schools and guiding teachers towards rural, remote and poor areas. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that it engages in the monitoring of provinces, cities and counties to review the effect given to the policies exempting students from tuition and incidental fees (in both rural and urban areas). This monitoring included school inspections in five provinces and autonomous regions, and indicated that these local governments had been correctly implementing the national policies. The Committee further notes the Government's statement that it has, since 2008, been carrying out monitoring work on progress towards the balanced development of compulsory education in 72 counties across the country. The Government states that the results of this monitoring work are submitted to the administrative department on national education for reference when formulating education policy, though the Committee observes that this information is not included in the Government's report.

The Committee notes the statement in the report of the UNICEF Executive Board entitled "Report of the field visit to China by members of the Bureau of the Executive Board" of 14 May 2010 that despite efforts made by the Government in the education sector, challenges remain, especially in western areas, including disparities in the quality of, and access to, education and the numbers of children out of school (E/ICEF/2010/CRP.11, paragraph 20). Lastly, the Committee notes the information in the compilation report of 16 December 2008 prepared by the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights for the Universal Periodic Review of China that the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women, the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and the Committee on the Rights of the Child each called upon China to eliminate all miscellaneous and other "hidden" fees for primary education (A/HRC/WG.6/4/CHN/2, paragraph 38). Considering that compulsory education is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, the Committee urges the Government to pursue its efforts to ensure that, in practice, all children have access to free compulsory education, paying particular attention to girls and children from ethnic minorities and in rural areas. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to considerably strengthen the mechanisms that monitor the enforcement of the Compulsory Education Law and the policies on exemptions for tuition and other fees. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on measures taken in this regard and to provide information from the monitoring and evaluation exercises conducted to monitor these policies.

2. Education for children of internal migrant workers. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the ITUC's allegations that, according to the hukou system (household registration), migrant workers' children, who travel with their parents to a city where they have no right to register as permanent residents, are not allowed access to schooling provided by the local governments. The Committee also noted that migrants started to organize their own schools, but that these schools were of variable quality. The Committee further noted the Government's statement that it had developed a variety of policy measures to ensure equal access to compulsory education for these children, including a 2005 circular explicitly providing that the policy in place for urban students would similarly apply to the children of migrant workers from rural areas and a 2006 State Council document aiming to ensure equal access to compulsory schooling for the children of migrant workers. The Government indicated that in 2006 the Compulsory Education Law was revised to provide that, "[l]ocal governments shall provide equal access to compulsory education for school-aged children living with their parents or guardians who are working or residing in places other than their registered permanent residences", following which localities established basic regimes to ensure access to compulsory education for migrant children.

The Committee notes the statement in the ITUC communication that at present, different regions provide different measures for the children of migrant workers, and these plans may shift according to the whim of the local government, resulting in a failure to provide stable education to these children. However, the Committee also notes the Government's statement that the restrictions linked to household registration have begun to change and that various levels of governments have taken measures to ensure that children of migrant workers receive compulsory education with local students, such as establishing budgets based on the total number of children accepted (not just the number of officially registered local children). In addition, the Government states that more support has been given to schools in areas with greater numbers of children of migrant workers and that subsidies have been given to provinces where progress has been made on this issue. Nonetheless, the Committee notes the information in the UNESCO 2010 report entitled Education for All: Global Monitoring Report (UNESCO EFA report) that, while the Government has introduced reforms, the hukou system continues to hinder access to education for the children of migrant workers. Even with requiring city authorities to accommodate holders of rural registration with temporary residence and employment permits, the children of many migrants continue to face restricted opportunities for education. The UNESCO EFA report indicates that only two-thirds of Beijing's 370,000 migrant children were enrolled in public schools. The UNESCO EFA report also indicates that school budgets continue to be based on the number of official students registered by authorities, and that while individual schools can accept unregistered children, their parents must typically pay a fee to compensate for the lack of government funds, therefore making education inaccessible. The UNESCO EFA report further indicates that the unauthorized migrant schools are of questionable quality and some have been forced to close. The Committee expresses its serious concern about the lack of accessible compulsory education for the children of migrant workers and urges the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure that these children have equal access to free basic education. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the results achieved, particularly on the number of children of migrant workers who were effectively provided with compulsory education through the measures taken, and estimates on the number of these children who remain out of school.

Article 3(1). Hazardous work. Hazardous work performed through work-study programmes. The Committee previously noted the situation of schoolchildren performing manual work at schools to compensate for the shortage of funds for their schooling. However, the Committee noted that the “Regulations on the Management of Safety in Middle Schools, Primary Schools and Kindergartens” (MEO23) was issued in 2006, which provided that schools are not allowed to organize pupils to take part in hazardous activities such as fabricating fireworks or involving toxic chemicals.

The Committee notes the Government’s statement that it attaches great importance to the safety of work in primary and middle schools, and that it has taken several measures in this respect. The Government indicates that it has strengthened awareness of safety issues (through education, training activities and drills), holding a national safety education day for primary and middle school students and disseminating 300,000 copies of the “Guidelines of Safe Work for Primary and Middle Schools”. The Committee also notes the Government’s indication that it has provided training to improve the capacity of school management with regard to safety and crisis response and has established a school safety inspection system to diagnose and remedy safety risks, to prevent future accidents.

However, the Committee notes the ITUC’s allegation that, although efforts have been made to curb the abuse of work-study programmes (programmes where children engage in work through their schools), these programmes are often used by employers to justify illegally low wages and used by schools to generate profit. The ITUC communication also states that, through these work study programmes, children are exposed to excessive working hours and unsafe workplaces, and provides examples of schoolchildren being brought to work in the grape-processing and cotton industries by their teachers. The ITUC further asserts that although some work-study schemes are limited to seasonal agricultural work, improving school facilities or making small handicrafts, many of these school programmes have resulted in children working in dangerous and labour-intensive industries such as agriculture, construction and factories for long hours and under harsh conditions. The Committee expresses its concern at the continued engagement of schoolchildren under 18 in hazardous types of work within the context of work study programmes. It accordingly urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to strictly enforce the prohibition of hazardous work contained in the MEO23 in order to ensure that persons under 18 years of age are not engaged in hazardous work through work-study programmes, even where safety and security measures are in place. Furthermore, noting an absence of information on this point in the Government’s report, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the number and nature of infringements of the MEO23 detected by the competent ministry, as well as the penalties applied.

Article 9(1) and Parts III and V of the report form. Penalties, labour inspectorate and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the ITUC’s indication that the extent of child labour remains difficult to assess due to a lack of official reporting on cases and the lack of transparency in statistics. The Committee also noted the comments of the All-China Federation of Trade Unions (ACFTU) urging the Government to make more of an effort with regard to law enforcement supervision. In this regard, the Committee noted the Government’s indication that the issue of child labour is dealt with through the investigation of complaints, routine inspections, in-focus operations and annual labour inspection schemes. The Committee also noted the establishment of a labour supervisory framework at the provincial, municipal and county levels.

The Committee notes the ITUC’s allegations that child labour has increasingly been reported in the footwear industry and in smaller workshops producing textiles, shoes and related products. The ITUC’s allegations contain many examples of the use of child labour, while stating that there is a lack of official published national data on the extent of child labour. The ITUC indicates that reliable and transparent data would be essential to formulate policies to address this problem. The Committee also notes the statement in the ITUC communication that while the growing number of labour inspectors represents a significant start towards proper enforcement, the numbers are still insufficient to cover all companies in China. Furthermore, the ITUC once again states that the chances of discovering child labour are slim given the shortage of labour inspectors and the extensive collusion between private businesses and local officials. The ITUC indicates that inspections continue to be of little value due to the common practice of informing factory owners in advance, so that on inspection days, working children are kept hidden or given the day off.

The Committee notes the information in the Government’s report that, by the end of 2009, the labour supervisory framework consisted of 3,291 organs of labour security and inspection (an increase in 20 units since 2007), and employed 23,000 full-time labour inspectors (1,000 more inspectors than in 2007), and 25,000 part-time inspectors. The Government indicates that active measures have been taken to prevent and investigate the illegal recruitment of children for employment and that, in the course of inspection activities, emphasis has been given to the provisions of national legislation regarding the prohibition of child labour and the protection of young workers. The Government also indicates that since 2006, special activities have been organized jointly with the ACFTU in this regard, including different types of inspections. The Committee takes due note of the efforts taken by the Government, including the increase in the number of labour inspectors, but expresses its concern regarding reports of collusion between inspectors and private businesses and regarding the lack of data available on the prevalence of child labour in the country. The Committee recalls that, pursuant to Article 9(1) of the Convention, all necessary measures shall be taken by the competent authority to ensure the effective enforcement of the provisions of the Convention, and urges the Government to take the necessary measures to address the issue of collusion between labour inspectors and enterprises to ensure thorough investigations into possible cases of child labour. In this regard, it requests the Government to provide information on the types of violations detected by the labour inspectorate, the number of persons prosecuted and the penalties imposed. The Committee also requests the Government to pursue its efforts to strengthen the capacity of the labour inspectorate, particularly with regard to the inspection of small enterprises. Lastly, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that sufficient up-to-date data on the situation of working children in China is made available, including, for example, data on the number of children and young persons below the minimum age who are engaged in economic activities, and statistics relating to the nature, scope and trends of their work.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2002)

The Committee notes the Government's report and the communication of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 1 September 2010.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. 1. Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 240 of the Criminal Law of 1997 prohibits the trafficking of women and children. It also noted the allegations of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, now the ITUC, that China is a source, transit and destination country for international human trafficking in women and children. The Committee noted the implementation of the ILO-IPEC "Preventing trafficking in girls and young women for labour exploitation within China" project (CP-TING Project), in collaboration with the All-China Women's Federation (ACWF), and the "Mekong Subregional Project to Combat Trafficking in Children and Women" (TICW Project). The Committee also noted that the State Council approved a new National Plan of Action against Trafficking in Women and Children (2008–12) (NPAT 2008–12) in 2007. However, the Committee noted the indication from several sources that the phenomenon of trafficking for the purposes of forced physical labour and prostitution was worsening.

The Committee notes the ITUC's allegations that there has been an increasing number of girls trafficked out of China to work as sex workers in Australia, Burma, Canada, Malaysia, Japan, Taiwan, the Philippines, the Middle East and the United States.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that the NPAT 2008–12 has been implemented in an effective manner, and has contributed to the reduction of the trafficking of women and children at the grassroots level. In this regard, the Government indicates that, in October 2008, the first Anti-Trafficking Inter-Ministerial Joint Meeting (IMJM) took place and that, in March 2009, the Ministry of Public Security, and other departments and agencies jointly issued the "Rules for the Implementation of the NPAT (2008–12)". The Committee further notes the ILO-IPEC information that the TICW Project Phase II was completed in 2008, and that its remaining activities were incorporated into the CP-TING Project. In this regard, the Committee notes that phase II of the CP-TING Project was launched on 17 March 2010. Phase II includes concrete actions to strengthen the implementation of provincial Plans of Action against trafficking, equip vulnerable youth with life skills before they migrate for work, set up trafficking prevention mechanisms and safe migration services and support referral services for vulnerable women and children. The Committee nonetheless notes the information in the report entitled "Child Trafficking in East and South-East Asia: Reversing the Trend", published by the UNICEF East Asia and Pacific Regional Office in August 2009 (UNICEF Trafficking Report) that trafficking occurs in every province in China, with most victims trafficked to the provinces of Guangdong, Shanxi, Fujian, Henan, Sichuan, Guangxi and Jiangsu (page 31). The UNICEF Trafficking Report further indicates that internal trafficking is more prevalent than cross-border trafficking, although the Committee notes the information in another UNICEF document (entitled "Protection and Community Services", available on the UNICEF website (www.unicef.org)) (UNICEF Protection Report) that cross-border trafficking appears to be on the rise. The Committee therefore requests the Government to redouble its efforts, within the framework of the NPAT 2008–12, to combat and eliminate both internal and cross-border trafficking of persons under 18. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken in this regard, and on the results achieved.

2. Forced labour. (i) Forced labour in re-education through labour camps. The Committee previously observed that China's prison system includes re-education through labour and juvenile criminal camps, and noted that records indicate that all prisoners, including persons under 18, are subject to hard labour. It noted the ITUC's allegations that, although the legislation calls for separate places for minors, in practice, due to limited spaces available, many minors are incarcerated with the adult population. The ITUC indicated that, pursuant to procedures inside the criminal justice system, children may be sent to labour camp re-education programmes. The Committee noted that the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights expressed grave concern about the use of forced labour as a corrective measure, without charge, trial or review, under the "Re-education through labour" programme (E/C.12/1/Add.107, paragraph 23) and that the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards emphasized the seriousness of such violations of Convention No. 182. In this regard, the Committee noted the Government's statement that, under the relevant legislation, any form of forced labour involving juvenile delinquents is banned. The Government indicated that, since 2006, the juvenile delinquent rehabilitation institutions have made efforts to increasingly conduct teaching in a classroom format and enhance training in vocational skills. In this regard, section 26 of the "Platform on re-education and reform of prisoners" of 2007 provides that the labour performed should focus on the acquisition of skills, and that the duration of labour shall not exceed four hours per day or 20 hours per week. In addition, the Ministry of Justice promulgated the “Regulations on the administration of juvenile delinquent rehabilitation institutions” which provide that children under the age of 16 are exempt from participation in productive labour. The Committee expressed its concern that these Regulations only exempt children under 16 years of age from productive labour.

The Committee notes the statement in the ITUC communication that there is little concrete evidence available on the new direction of this re-education through labour institutions (pursuant to section 26 of the “Platform on re-education and reform of prisoners”), such as low labour intensity activities and a maximum number of hours a week, and that statistics on the activities in these schools remain minimal. However, the ITUC does indicate that the number of these re-education-through-labour institutions is being reduced. The ITUC states that there appear to be no specific regulations which guide the exact procedures through which minors are sent to these schools, and expresses the view that the use of these schools is in contravention of the Convention.

The Committee notes the information in the Government’s report that section 75 of the prison law states that the execution of criminal punishments on juvenile delinquents shall be based on education and reform, that this labour shall conform to the characteristics of minors, and the main objective of this labour is to acquire an elementary education. The Government expresses the view that the labour assigned to juvenile delinquents is not forced labour, but a kind of skills training and education. The Government indicates that, by the end of 2008, there were 74 special schools for the purpose of education and rectification, with 9,631 students nationwide. Pursuant to section 25 of the Law on the Protection of Minors, students are only sent to these schools for continued education if disciplinary measures in regular schools (or by guardians) prove ineffective in rectifying undesirable behaviour. Section 25 states that the staff of these schools shall show concern and provide good care for students, and that these schools shall provide an ideological and cultural education, including education in vocational skills. The Government states that this labour and vocational and technical training aims to improve the employability and earning capacity of the juveniles, to avoid recidivism. The Government further states that juveniles are housed separately from adult inmates, in reformatories that attend to the psychological and physiological needs of the minors and that all provinces have established separate juvenile delinquent rehabilitation institutions, which provide classroom education, psychological services, vocational and technical education (following the completion of compulsory schooling) and family visits. The Committee notes the Government’s statement that juvenile delinquent institutions consist of juveniles who shall be rehabilitated through education (those under 16) and juveniles who will be re-educated through labour (those between 16 and 18).

(ii) Forced labour in work–study programmes (school-related or contracted work programmes). The Committee previously noted the ITUC statement that many schools force children to work in order to make up school budgets. Under these programmes, pupils are obliged to work to “learn a skill”, but often they perform regular work in labour-intensive unskilled positions for long periods of time. In parts of the country, children are found to be working, during school hours, in assembling fireworks, beadwork, or other cottage industry-type production, as well as harvesting the yearly cotton harvest (particularly in the Xinjiang Uyghur autonomous region). However, the Committee noted the Government’s indication that the “Provisional Rules of the State Council on work–study programmes for middle and primary schools” prohibited hard work and heavy labour for middle and primary school students in the work–study context, and that the types of work performed by the students were within their capacities. The Committee nonetheless echoed the concern expressed by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards about the situation of children under 18 performing forced labour through work–study programmes.

The Committee notes the information in the ITUC communication that large numbers of rural schools have contracted out classes of students to work in factories or in the fields in labour-intensive tasks for long periods of time. The ITUC indicates that schools from the poorer inland provinces make direct contacts with the factories to send the students who work (during breaks as well as during term time) to raise funds, and that the majority of the children involved are between the ages of 11 and 15. The ITUC indicates that, following the 2006 government directive on safety standards, some children in the Xinjiang Uyghur autonomous region were directed to marginally less taxing types of work, such as harvesting of beetroots, tomatoes and other vegetables on state farms and the collection of recycling. In 2008, the local education department prohibited children between the ages of 6 and 14 from participating in the cotton harvest, and provided increased funding to the schools that had previously harvested cotton. However, the ITUC states that this directive was not enforced at the local level and children were still forced to participate in the 2008 harvest. The ITUC reiterates that participation in this harvest is mandatory, that children may face fines for working too slowly or failing to meet production quotas, and that the behaviour during the harvest is reflected in school marks.

The Committee notes the Government’s statement in its report submitted under the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) that it attaches great importance to the safety of work in primary and middle schools, but observes an absence of information on measures taken to protect children engaged by their schools in external enterprises, or measures taken to address mandatory participation in these types of work. However, the Committee notes the statement in the UNICEF Trafficking Report that reports indicate that several schools force students to work in factories under the veil of “work–study”.

Therefore, the Committee expresses its serious concern at the compulsory nature of the work performed by children under 18 in re-education through labour programmes and by schoolchildren under the age of 18 within the context of work–study programmes. The Committee reminds the Government that, by virtue of Article 3(a) of the Convention, all forms of forced or compulsory labour are considered to be among the worst forms of child labour in which persons under 18 years of age may not be engaged and that, pursuant to Article 1 of the Convention, governments must take immediate and effective measures to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. Accordingly, the Committee strongly urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure that children under 18 years of age are not, under any circumstance, forced to work within the framework of re-education through labour programmes or work-study programmes. With regard to re-education through labour programmes, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the “Regulations on the administration of juvenile delinquent rehabilitation institutions” are extended to exempt children between 16 and 18 years from productive labour in these institutions. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on the concrete steps taken to eradicate these types of forced or compulsory labour, and on the results achieved.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. Labour inspectorate. The Committee previously noted that the labour inspectorate is responsible for monitoring the implementation of the provisions concerning child labour. It noted the ITUC’s allegations that despite national legislation banning child labour and its worst forms, there remained a serious gap between legislation and implementation, and that children worked in hazardous types of work, such as the fireworks industry, brick kilns and glass-making industries. The All-China Federation of Trade Unions (ACFTU) also stated that, while the legislation prohibiting the use of child labour is complete, the illegal use of child labour still exists. The Committee further noted the establishment of a labour supervisory framework, consisting of three-tiered organizations at the provincial, municipal and county levels.

The Committee notes the statement in the ITUC communication that, while the increase in the number of labour inspectors is a significant step towards adequate enforcement, there remains not enough labour inspectors to properly monitor the number of enterprises in the country. Furthermore, the ITUC reiterates that the detection of child labour is unlikely, due to this shortage of labour inspectors and the extensive collusion between private enterprises and local officials. The ITUC indicates that it is quite common for factory owners to receive advance warning concerning upcoming inspections, allowing these owners to hide working children or give these children the day off, which renders these inspections meaningless. The ITUC states that the commonplace practice of advance warning of labour inspections indicates the almost endemic nature of official corruption at the local level, and that increased resources in anti-corruption efforts have not decreased this problem. The ITUC communication states that the existence of child labour, including the worst forms of child labour, remains high, due in part to the lack of proper enforcement of legislation. However, the ITUC communication also references progress in some areas, stating that authorities have increased efforts to improve safety in the fireworks industry, and to address the use of child labour in this industry. The ITUC also states that the increase in detection of cases of forced labour (and the sale of children for this purpose) may be due to increased investigations in this area (but that it may reflect a rise in this phenomenon).

The Committee notes the information in the Government’s report that, by the end of 2009, the labour supervisory framework had grown to include 3,291 organs of labour security and inspection (an increase in 20 units since 2007), and employed 23,000 full-time labour inspectors (1,000 more inspectors than in 2007), and 25,000 part-time inspectors. The Government also indicates that, in collaboration with the ACFTU and other institutions, it launched nationwide supervision operations on, inter alia, rectifying illicit employment and combating related criminal activities, in addition to inspections focused on the implementation of legislation related to the prohibition of child labour. The Government further states that joint inspection activities have been undertaken with the departments of public security and occupational safety and health, and that the briefing of these multi-department efforts has been published and disseminated. The Committee further notes the Government’s indication that labour inspections have been reorganized to be carried out based on a grid system. The Government indicates that this system has permitted the gradual expansion of the coverage of labour inspections, including to rural areas. The Committee welcomes the Government’s efforts to strengthen and expand the capacity of the labour inspectorate, but must express its concern regarding allegations of endemic corruption and collusion between labour inspectors and private businesses, which compromise the functioning of labour inspection and the detection of child labour, including its worst forms. The Committee accordingly urges the Government to take the necessary measures to strengthen the functioning and the capacity of the labour inspection system with regard to the detection of cases of child labour and its worst forms. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to redouble its efforts to address the corruption within the labour inspection system, to eliminate the practice of advance warnings and to ensure thorough investigations into possible cases of the worst forms of child labour. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on concrete measures taken in this regard in its next report.

Article 7(1). Penalties. 1. Trafficking. The Committee previously noted that section 240 of the Criminal Law provides penalties for the sale and trafficking of children. It also noted the ITUC’s allegation that, despite efforts by the Chinese authorities to stem the problem of trafficking in women and children, grassroots authorities had generally failed to take effective action, emphasizing that the problem lay in the implementation of the law and not in the legislation itself.

The Committee notes the ITUC’s statement that domestic laws do not provide adequate sanctions for trafficking-related crimes. The ITUC states that, while buying trafficked children carries a sentence of three years’ imprisonment, the vast majority of buyers are not prosecuted, particularly if the child is not harmed and the buyer cooperates with the police. The ITUC’s allegations also indicate that, in some cases, factory personnel who employ trafficked juveniles do not receive administrative or penal sanctions following the rescue of the children. The ITUC also indicates that there is a lack of transparency in reporting and investigations. Furthermore, the ITUC states that Chinese police and local authorities collude with traffickers in the Tibet Autonomous Region near the Nepal border, to recruit girls and women to work as escorts and prostitutes, resulting in approximately 10,000 sex workers in the city of Lhasa. In addition, the ITUC communication indicates that the corruption of officials, and their collusion with criminal groups (despite anti-corruption measures taken) has severely hindered anti-trafficking efforts.

The Committee notes the information in the Government's report that between June 2008 and May 2010, courts at all levels sentenced 5,308 persons in 3,266 cases for trafficking in women and children, and 217 persons in 137 cases for buying trafficked women and children. The Committee observes that the Government does not provide information on whether criminal sanctions were imposed on those convicted. The Committee reminds the Government that, by virtue of Article 7(1) of the Convention, the Government is required to take all necessary measures to ensure the effective implementation and enforcement of the provisions giving effect to the Convention, including the application of penal sanctions. The Committee expresses its deep concern at allegations of complicity of law enforcement officials with human traffickers and accordingly urges the Government to take immediate measures to ensure that thorough investigations and robust prosecutions of perpetrators of the trafficking of children (including the buyers of persons under 18), and complicit government officials, are carried out and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed in practice. In this regard, it requests the Government to provide information on the number of persons (including governmental officials) investigated, convicted and sentenced for cases of trafficking involving victims under the age of 18, and the penal sanctions imposed.

2. Forced labour. The Committee previously observed that, pursuant to section 244 of the Criminal Law, a person committing the offence of forced labour may be sentenced only to a fine. The Committee considered that this penalty was not sufficiently dissuasive to the extent that it may merely consist of a fine. It reminded the Government that, by virtue of Article 7(1) of the Convention, the Government shall take the necessary measures to ensure the effective implementation and enforcement of the provisions giving effect to the Convention, including the provision and application of the penal sanction of imprisonment.

The Committee notes the information in the ITUC's allegations that, following the discovery of the forced labour of children in the Shanxi brick kilns, authorities indicated that dozens of officials would be punished. However, only six lower level officials were subsequently punished, receiving only warnings or demotions, and no criminal charges were laid. The ITUC states that the failure of the Government to properly bring the perpetrators of the crime of forced labour to justice does not bode well for the eradication of this worst form of child labour. The ITUC further indicates that the charges brought against the brick kiln owners were primarily based on the issues of poor working conditions and lack of pay, as opposed to charges of slavery and forced labour.

The Committee once again notes with regret the lack of information in the Government's report on this point. It urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the application of the penalty of imprisonment for an offence as serious as one involving forced labour, to ensure that persons who force children under 18 years of age to work are prosecuted and that effective and dissuasive penalties are applied, as a matter of urgency.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (d). Identifying and reaching out to children at special risk. Beggars and homeless children. The Committee previously noted the issuance of the "Opinions on strengthening the work on adolescent vagrants" which stipulates the duties of various departments in combating the phenomenon of child begging and protecting and rehabilitating homeless or begging minors. The Committee also noted that the Criminal Law was amended in 2006 to prohibit any person from organizing, by means of violence and coercion, disabled persons or minors under 14 years of age, to beg. However, the Committee echoed the observation of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards that large numbers of child beggars still exist.

The Committee notes the statement in the ITUC's allegations that some abducted women and children in the country are forced to engage in begging. The ITUC indicates that, in 2009, 20 children (between the ages of 8 and 16) who had been abducted and forced into pickpocket gangs in southern China were rescued. These children were forced to beg, and were physically punished when they failed to earn the amount expected.

The Committee notes the detailed information in the Government's report regarding its recent initiatives to reach vagrant children. The Government indicates that between 2008 and 2010, the Government invested 470 million yuan renminbi (CNY) for the construction of 327 homeless relief and protection centres, through the implementation of the "Eleventh Five-Year Plan on the Establishment of a Relief and Protection System for Vagrant Minors". The Ministry of Civil Affairs will additionally invest over CNY30 million in the construction of 40 relief and protection centres. The Government indicates that it has worked to implement the "Basic Norms on Relief and Protection Institutions for Homeless Children", which requires that these children receive services including daily life care, education, skills training, psychological counselling and behavioural correction, to promote the permanent removal of these children from vagrancy. The Government further indicates that, between June 2008 and June 2010, the Ministry of Civil Affairs held ten workshops for staff of relief and protection agencies, on themes such as relief for (and protection of) vagrant minors, informal education and aid for homeless children. In 2009, the Ministry of Civil Affairs compiled a "Guide on Aid and Protection of Vagrant Children", which summarized best practices on the protection of these children. Lastly, the Committee notes that, in September 2009, the Ministry of Public Security, the Ministry of Civil Affairs and the Ministry of Health launched a special rectification operation against child begging and forced juvenile delinquency.

Nonetheless, the Committee notes the information from the UNICEF Protection Report that the number of China's urban street children is growing and that, based on the number of children passing through protection centres, the Ministry of Civil Affairs estimates that there are around 150,000 such children. The UNICEF Protection Report states that many of these children come from migrant families, or migrated by themselves from rural areas, and that these children are particularly vulnerable to risks. While noting the numerous measures taken by the Government, the Committee recalls that street children are particularly vulnerable to the worst forms of child labour. It accordingly urges the Government to pursue its efforts to protect homeless children and child beggars from these worst forms and to provide for their rehabilitation and social integration and to ensure that programmes are open to child participation. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the progress made in this regard, and the results achieved.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Macau Special Administrative Region

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (notification: 2000)

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy designed to ensure the effective abolition of child labour. The Committee had previously noted the Government's indication that in order to eliminate child labour, the Government had introduced a 15-year free education system which would last until the age of 18 years. It had also noted the Government's indication that the new legislative draft of the Labour Law contains more specific stipulations concerning the elimination of child labour and provides for better protection to children and young persons. The Committee notes with interest that the Labour Relations Law No. 7/2008 (Labour Law of 2008), which was adopted by the Legislative Assembly on 5 August 2008, came into force on 1 January 2009.

Article 3(1) and (2). Minimum age for admission to, and determination of, types of hazardous work. The Committee had previously noted the Government's indication that the draft Labour Law specifically stipulates the places and types of dangerous work to which the admission of minors under 18 years will be prohibited or subjected to restrictions. The Committee notes with satisfaction that according to section 29 of the Labour Law of 2008, an employer shall not employ a minor to perform: (1) domestic work; (2) overtime work; (3) work during the period from 9 p.m. to 7 a.m. of the following day; (4) work at places where admission is forbidden to under-18s; and (5) work on the list of prohibited occupations for minors, approved by dispatch of the Chief Executive. It notes that pursuant to subsection (5) of section 29, the Government adopted the Chief Executive's Dispatch No. 343/2008, approving the list of occupations with restricted conditions for minors, and the Chief Executive's Dispatch No. 344/2008, approving the list of prohibited occupations for minors. The Committee also notes that the first part of the List No. 343/2008 contains the types of work that involve either physical or chemical elements that might affect minors such as: work exposed to ultraviolet radiation, very high or low temperature, high noise levels and vibration, and other corrosive, irritant or inflammable substances; the second part contains the types of work that because of their nature involve certain physical or mental risk, for example, dangerous operations, demolishing work or work whose rhythm causes tension or pressure; and the third part involves the type of workplaces that may put minors at risk, for example, where fierce or venomous animals are kept, laboratories, hospitals, slaughter houses, etc. List No. 344/2008 enumerates work involving physical and chemical factors; work processes that involve certain dangerous materials such as asphalt, resin and other hydrocarbon-based polymer products; work with dangerous machines; workplaces such as confined spaces, in compressed air, underwater, at dangerous heights; and other establishments such as health clubs, billiard saloons, bars and amusement game centres. Moreover, according to the provisions of section 85(2) of the Labour Law of 2008, an employer employing minors to work in violation of the provisions of section 29 shall be punished with a fine of 10,000 patacas (MOP) (about US$1,250) to MOP25,000 (about US$3,100).

Article 7(1) and (3). Light work. The Committee had previously observed that according to the provisions of the draft Labour Law, children between 14 and 16 years of age may undertake light work activities in public or private entities during the school holidays in the summer. However, these provisions did not determine the hours and conditions under which such work may be undertaken. The Committee notes the Government's statement that concerning the working hours for minors, the Labour Law of 2008 has made a general provision in this regard, irrespective of whether the employee concerned is an adult, or whether it involves full-time employment or only short-term work during summer holidays. Accordingly, section 33 of the Labour Law of 2008, stipulates that the normal working hours shall not exceed eight hours a day and 48 hours a week, with a break period of not less than 30 consecutive minutes so that the employee will not work more than five consecutive hours. Furthermore, section 33(2) stipulates that the employee shall have a total of not less than 12 hours of rest per day.

Part V of the report form. Practical application of the Convention. The Committee notes that according to section 31(1) of the Labour Law of 2008, the employer must notify the Labour Affairs Bureau of the conclusion of a labour contract with a minor, within 15 days from the date of its conclusion. In this regard the Committee notes the Government's indication that during the period from 1 January 2009 to 31 May 2010, the Labour Affairs Bureau received notifications from 66 employers for hiring 642 minors. The Committee further notes the statistical information provided by the Government on the number of violations detected by the Labour Affairs Bureau with regard to the employment of minors. According to this data, during the period from June 2008 to May 2010, 70 cases involving 110 minors were detected of which most of the violations were with regard to failing to notify the Labour Affairs Bureau within 15 days of hiring the minors, hiring of minors without a written medical certificate and hiring of minors without a written authorization from their legal representative. The Committee further notes the Government's statement that the Labour Affairs Bureau has dealt with all these violations by levying corresponding fines against the violating employers. It also notes the Government's reference to a court decision against an employer who engaged a minor child of less than 16 years without obtaining prior proof that the latter possess the necessary physical condition as required to perform that work. The employer was sentenced to pay a fine of MOP2,500 (about US$315).

Colombia

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes the Government's report. It also notes the comments of the Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CTC) and the Single Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CUT) of 30 August 2010 and the General Confederation of Labour (CGT) of 10 September 2010.

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the adoption of the "National strategy to prevent and eliminate the worst forms of child labour and protect young workers (2008–15)" (National strategy against the worst forms of child labour), drawn up in cooperation with ILO–IPEC and UNICEF. It noted that programmes of action would be developed to implement the national strategy. It further noted the adoption of the "National Development Plan (2006–10)", which aims in particular to reduce poverty and reduce child labour. The Committee noted that the measures taken by the Government enabled the percentage of working children to be reduced between 2001 and 2005.

The Committee notes the CTC's and CUT's comment that the national policy to eliminate child labour is not effective, since it is based on helping families in situations of extreme poverty by providing them with conditional cash transfers. However, these subsidies are not sufficient to remove these families from poverty and further action is needed. The CTC and CUT further point out that the real percentage of working children in 2007 is 14.3 per cent (1,628,300 children), since in addition to the 6.9 per cent of children working (786,576), account should be taken of the 7.4 per cent (841,733) performing household chores for 15 hours or more daily. Children were prevalently found to be working in the agricultural sector (36.4 per cent).

The Committee notes the Government's information that, in the framework of the National Development Plan, the regional competent authorities committed themselves to give priority to projects targeting children and adolescents involved in child labour. As regards the implementation of the National strategy against the worst forms of child labour and the National plan for the eradication of child labour and the protection of young workers (National plan against child labour), the Government indicates that the percentage of working children between 5 and 17 years decreased from 8.9 per cent in 2005 to 6.9 per cent in 2007. The percentage of working boys is higher than that of working girls (9.4 per cent compared to 4.2 per cent). The Government further indicates that the next statistics on child labour will be included in the household-based survey of the fourth trimester of 2009 and results will be available in the second trimester of 2010. The Committee notes the Government's information that 32 provinces were assisted in their strategies to eliminate child labour through the project "Strengthening direct intervention for the prevention, disincentive and progressive eradication of child labour and protection of young workers". While taking due note of the efforts made by the Government, the Committee must express its concern at the large number of children found to be working, especially in the agricultural sector and in household chores. The Committee strongly encourages the Government to continue its efforts to combat child labour and requests it to provide information on any measures taken in the context of the National strategy against the worst forms of child labour, the National plan against child labour and the National Development Plan, indicating in particular the programmes of action to be implemented and the results achieved. It also requests the Government to continue providing information on the application of the Convention in practice, including, for example, statistical data relating to the employment of children between 5 and 15 years of age, and extracts of the reports of the inspection services.

Article 2(1). Scope of application. In its previous comments, the Committee indicated that its understanding was that the provisions of the Children and Young Persons' Code regulating the employment of children and young persons apply in the context of an employment relationship. The Government indicated that, as far as the Department of Cundinamarca was concerned, permission to work was also given to young persons working in a context other than an employment relationship. The Committee noted that this information concerned only one department and not the whole of the country.

The Committee notes the CTC's and CUT's comment that the newly established labour inspection model only covers young persons with a work permit. No inspections are carried out with regard to children and young workers who work outside an employment relationship. Therefore, children and young persons who work in the informal sector or who are self-employed do not enjoy the protection afforded by the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's information that the preventive inspection model aims to promote actions to protect children and young persons who work as a vulnerable category of workers. Currently, the number of labour inspectors has increased from 289 to 424. The Committee observes that the Government provides no information on whether inspections cover children and young persons working outside an employment relationship. The Committee further notes that, according to the National strategy against the worst forms of child labour, most working children are occupied in agriculture, mainly in harvesting coffee, sugar cane, fruit and vegetables, trade, services and industry. It once again recalls that the Convention applies to all sectors of economic activity and that it covers all forms of employment and work, whether or not there is an employment contract and whether or not the work is paid. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that children who are not bound by an employment relationship, such as those who are self-employed or who work in the informal economy, are granted the protection afforded by the Convention. In this regard, it requests the Government to take the necessary measures to strengthen the capacity and expand the reach of the labour inspection services in order to ensure that inspections cover children and young persons who are self-employed or work in the informal economy.

Article 2(3). Compulsory education. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC), in its concluding observations of June 2006 (CRC/C/COL/3, paragraph 76), expressed its concern that the Government still did not have a national education strategy focusing on the rights of the child, and that the ethnic education policy (bilingual education) for indigenous communities was limited in scope and often applied without the persons concerned being sufficiently consulted. It noted that, according to the Education for All (EFA) Global Monitoring Report 2008 published by UNESCO, entitled Education for all by 2015: Will we make it?, while Colombia was on course to achieve the goal of universal primary education for all by 2015, the country might not achieve the goal of gender parity in secondary education, to the detriment of boys. It further noted the Government's information on the various action programmes implemented in the country to improve the working of the education system in Colombia, particularly those relating to groups at risk of dropping out of school. Finally, it noted that, in the context of the implementation of the National strategy against the worst forms of child labour, educational measures would be adopted, particularly with regard to the most vulnerable groups in the population.

The Committee notes that the CTC and CUT express their concern at the lack of measures to integrate children belonging to vulnerable groups, such as Afro-Colombian and indigenous people into education. They also recall that, in its concluding observations of 7 June 2010 (E/C.12/COL/CO/5, paragraph 29), the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights was concerned that access to free and compulsory education was not fully ensured. The CTC and CUT further stress that in 2007, 42.5 per cent of child labourers between 5 and 17 years did not attend school. Children from rural areas constituted the largest group not attending school.

The Committee notes the Government's information that regarding children between 5 and 14 years, the goal of universal primary education for all is being achieved since the net enrolment rate was 92.01 per cent in 2009. The Government indicates that the main objective of the education strategy is to integrate more vulnerable groups into education. As a result of the measures taken in this regard, as of 2009, 526,044 displaced children and 361,348 children from indigenous groups were integrated into primary and secondary schools. The Committee notes the Government's information that statistical data on the number of children and adolescents who work are checked against data on school enrolment. In the case in which it is found that children who work do not attend school, the education departments are directed in the framework of the National strategy against the worst forms of child labour to integrate these children into school. Of the 14,152 children and adolescents who were found working, 3,798 did not attend school; 1,799 of them were integrated into school in 2009. The Government indicates that various initiatives are carried out to assist children who work and study in order to keep them in schools. These measures especially focus on child and adolescent workers and displaced children. They include: (a) the conditional cash transfer programme "Familias en acción", which provides grants to poor households with children, on the condition, inter alia, that children aged between 7 and 18 attend no less than 80 per cent of school classes during the school year; (b) "jornadas escolares complementarias", which address the causes of school drop-outs and offer students alternatives for taking advantage of complementary education. In the first trimester of 2009, 1,938,626 students participated in "jornadas escolares complementarias". The Committee notes that, according to data for 2008 from the UNESCO Institute of Statistics, the primary-school enrolment rate is 90 per cent both for girls and boys and the secondary-school enrolment rate is 75 per cent for girls and 68 per cent for boys, thus reflecting a rate increase compared with 2007. In view of the fact that compulsory education is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, the Committee requests the Government to continue its efforts to improve the functioning of the education system in the country. In this regard, it requests the Government to supply information on the measures taken, within the framework of the National strategy against the worst forms of child labour, to increase school attendance rates at both primary and secondary levels and further reduce gender disparity in access to education, particularly at the secondary level, by giving special attention to boys and to the most vulnerable groups in the population, such as children in rural areas and displaced children, Afro-Colombian and indigenous children.

Article 3(3). Hazardous work from the age of 16 years. The Committee previously noted that, under the terms of section 4 of Resolution No. 01677 of 20 May 2008, young persons between 15 and 17 years of age who completed technical training with the National Apprenticeship Service (SENA) or institutes accredited for this purpose may be authorized to work in an activity for which they have been trained and may be able to freely exercise this occupation, art or trade, on condition that the contractor respects the terms of Decree No. 1295 of 1994 and Decree No. 933 of 2003, Resolution No. 1016 of 1989 and Resolution No. 2346 of 2007, and also Decision No. 584 of 2004 of the Andean Committee for Occupational Safety and Health Authorizations. While observing that both conditions laid down by Article 3(3) of the Convention were respected by section 4 of Resolution No. 01677, the Committee understood that under this provision young persons between 15 and 17 years of age who have completed their apprenticeship or technical training with the SENA or institutes accredited for this purpose may perform the types of hazardous work prohibited by section 2 of the resolution.

The Committee notes the Government's information that children between 15 and 17 years of age need the written authorization of the labour inspectorate to work. The ministry will analyse in each case whether there is any moral or physical hazard for the minor before issuing the permit. The Government further recalls that Resolution No. 01677 prohibits hazardous work for all children under 18 years. The Committee observes that it is still unclear whether pursuant to section 4 of Resolution No. 01677, young persons between 15 and 17 years of age may perform the types of hazardous work listed in section 2 of the resolution. The Committee requests the Government to clarify whether under section 4 of Resolution No. 01677, young persons between 15 and 17 years may perform the types of hazardous work prohibited for children under 18 years listed in section 2 of the resolution. If so, it requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that only young persons from 16 years who have received adequate specific instruction or vocational training may be allowed to perform types of hazardous work, in conformity with Article 3(3) of the Convention.

Article 9(1). Penalties. The Committee previously noted that Resolution No. 01677 of 20 May 2008 does not contain any provision providing for penalties for violations of section 2 concerning the prohibition on employing young persons under 18 years of age in hazardous work.

The Committee notes the Government's information that non-compliance with legislation regarding minors is punishable by fines of between one and 100 minimum wages. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the provisions of national legislation which lay down such penalties and to provide information on their application in practice.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2005)

The Committee notes the Government's report. It also notes the comments of the Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CTC) and the Single Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CUT) of 30 August 2010.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict. In its previous comments, the Committee observed that, despite the prohibition on the forced or compulsory recruitment of children for use in armed conflict laid down by the national legislation and the measures taken by the Government to address the issue of forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict, children were still being forced to join illegal armed groups or the armed forces.

The Committee notes the CTC's and CUT's comment that one of the reasons why the forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict continues is that no dissuasive penalties have been inflicted on offenders. Moreover, enforcement agencies lack the necessary training as regards both the human rights of child victims of forced recruitment in armed forces and the protection that should be afforded by the State to children separated from illegal armed groups. The CTC and CUT also underline that dialogue with illegal armed groups to stop recruiting children under 18 years in armed conflict and to demobilize those currently recruited, is lacking.

The Committee notes that, according to the report of the United Nations Secretary-General on children and armed conflict of 28 August 2009 (S/2009/434) (report of the Secretary-General), the Government of Colombia has adopted extensive measures to prevent the recruitment of children (such as developing an "early warning system" for monitoring imminent risks of violations of human rights and creating an inter-sectoral commission for the prevention of recruitment and use of children by illegal armed groups) and reintegrate former child victims of forced recruitment in illegal armed groups into their communities (paragraphs 52–72). Despite these measures, in the reporting period (January–December 2008) illegal armed groups continued to recruit children for use in armed conflict. For example, in January 2008 a 16-year old child was recruited by the Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias de Colombia – Ejército del Pueblo (FARC–EP) in Tame, department of Arauca; in May 2008, 40 members of the FARC–EP, half of them between 13 and 17 years of age, were seen in the department of Cauca; between February and March 2008, three 15-year-old indigenous girls were recruited by FARC–EP, two in Toribío, department of Cauca and one in the rural area of Pasto, department of Nariño. In August 2008, seven children who had been members of the Ejército de Liberación Nacional (ELN) surrendered to the army in Cumbal, Nariño. Moreover, the illegal armed groups that emerged after the demobilization of the Autodefensas Unidas de Colombia (AUC) (such as Autodefensas Campesinas Nueva Generación, Aguilas Negras and Ejército Revolucionario Popular Antiterrorista de Colombia) reportedly continued to recruit children. Furthermore, both FARC–EP and ELN continued child recruitment campaigns in schools (paragraphs 15–22). In addition, some members of the armed forces continued to use children for intelligence activities. In February 2008, it was reported that the national police used a 12-year-old boy as an informant; the boy received death threats from FARC–EP and was eventually killed by an unidentified assailant (paragraph 23). It was also reported that, as a result of their forced recruitment for use in armed conflict, children suffered from serious violations by illegal armed groups and some individual members of the state forces, such as murder, injuries, abductions, rapes and other forms of sexual violence (paragraphs 27–51). Cases of children killed by FARC–EP and ELN were reported in the departments of Antioquia, Arauca, Guaviare, Huila, Meta, Nariño, Putumayo and Valle del Cauca. Cases were also reported of children being killed for refusing to join the illegal armed groups (paragraphs 27–29). Moreover, according to the Attorney-General's Office, as of November 2008, among the 50 cases of extrajudicial executions under investigation, there are 51 child victims. In October 2008, a transitional commission was established to carry out an administrative investigation and to analyse the problem of extrajudicial executions: as a result, the President decided to dismiss 27 national army officers from service (paragraphs 34–35).

The Committee notes that, according to the report of the Secretary-General, estimates of the number of children participating in illegal armed groups range from 8,000 according to the Ministry of Defence, to 11,000 according to non-governmental sources. As of December 2008, the Special Investigative Unit for Women, Adolescents and Children within the Attorney-General's Office conducted investigations in 141 cases involving 634 child victims – 485 boys and 149 girls. Three guilty verdicts were handed down as of December 2008. Moreover, within the framework of the Justice and Peace Act No. 975 of 2005 (the law under which the members of demobilized self-defence groups are brought to trial), 2,133 child victims were identified. Out of the 3,284 former members of AUC who currently participate voluntarily in the depositions provided for by the Justice and Peace Act, 23 so far have confessed to the recruitment and use of a total of 654 children within their ranks, and the Attorney-General's Office is verifying 366 additional cases. However, less than 400 children were handed over in the collective demobilizations of AUC. According to the report of the Secretary-General, despite those positive advances, impunity for grave violations against children, as well as obtaining consolidated information and following up on convictions and proceedings, remain major challenges in Colombia (paragraphs 59–61).

The Committee observes that, despite the further measures taken by the Government, children are still being forced to join illegal armed groups. It once again expresses its deep concern at the persistence of this practice, especially as it leads to other grave violations of the rights of children, such as murder, sexual violence or abduction. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to take immediate and effective measures to put a stop in practice to the forced or compulsory recruitment of children for use in armed conflict and proceed with the full and immediate demobilization of all children. With reference to Security Council resolution 1882 of 4 August 2009, which recalls "the responsibilities of States to end impunity and to prosecute those responsible for genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and other egregious crimes perpetrated against children", the Committee once again urges the Government to ensure that thorough investigations and robust prosecutions of offenders are undertaken and that sufficient effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed on any person found guilty of recruiting or using children under 18 years of age for the purpose of armed conflict. It requests the Government to supply information in this regard.

Article 6. Programmes of action. Inter-sectoral commission for the prevention of recruitment and the use of children by illegal armed groups. The Committee notes the Government's information that the inter-sectoral commission for the prevention of recruitment and the use of children by illegal armed groups was created by Decree No. 4690 of 2007. It is in charge of coordinating the actions of ten governmental institutions, each of which has responsibilities in prevention and recruitment. The Committee notes that, according to the report of the Secretary-General, as a result of the technical support provided by the inter-sectoral commission in 50 municipalities in 26 departments, 40 municipalities and two departments adopted specific action plans to prevent child recruitment by illegal armed groups (paragraph 65). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the implementation of the plans of action adopted to prevent the forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict following the intervention of the inter-sectoral commission for the prevention of recruitment and the use of children by illegal armed groups.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour. Child soldiers. The Committee previously noted that, according to the report of the United Nations Secretary-General on children and armed conflict of 21 December 2007 (A/62/609-S/2007/757, paragraphs 113 to 120), positive efforts were made by the Government in the demobilization of combatants from the AUC. It noted that 3,326 children previously associated with illegal armed groups benefited, through the Colombian Family Welfare Institute (ICBF), from the government initiative to prevent the recruitment of children by armed groups and reintegrate them into their communities.

The Committee notes the CTC's and CUT's observation that, notwithstanding the significant efforts of the ICBF to protect children separated from illegal armed groups, the programme should extend its geographical coverage. Moreover, the collaboration of the health, education, justice and labour sectors with the ICBF should be strengthened. Measures and strategies at the national level to adequately reintegrate child victims are lacking, especially as regards programmes aimed at promoting access to education for former child victims thus ensuring that their needs are taken into account and that they stay in schools or have access to vocational training programmes. Psychological assistance to child victims is also lacking.

The Committee notes that, according to the report of the Secretary-General, as of December 2008, the programme launched by ICBF assisted 3,876 children separated from illegal armed groups, of whom 2,146 were separated from FARC–EP, 1,042 from AUC, 538 from ELN and 150 from other groups. Of that number, 73 per cent were boys and 27 per cent were girls. During the reporting period (January–December 2008) the ICBF data indicates that a total of 314 children were separated from FARC–EP, 65 from ELN and 13 from the Ejército Revolucionario Guevarista. In addition, 23 children were separated from other groups, including the Autodefensas Campesinas Nueva Generación, Aguilas Negras and Rastrojos. In August 2008, the Ejército Revolucionario Guevarista handed over seven children to the ICBF. The number of children separated from illegal armed groups was greater in 2008 than in 2006 and 2007

(paragraphs 67–70). The Committee notes that, according to the report of Colombia of 21 October 2009 submitted under article 8 of the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the involvement of children in armed conflict (CRC/C/OPAC/COL/1), the model implemented by ICBF for the protection of children and young persons demobilized from illegal armed groups was strengthened between 1 June 2006 and 31 May 2007 and now involves four distinct phases: identification and diagnosis, treatment, consolidation, and monitoring and follow-up. Each of the four phases entails specific action to restore rights through assistance provided through transition homes, specialized care centres, juvenile centres, foster families or family-based support systems. As of 30 June 2008, 516 children were in this programme (paragraphs 258–264). The Committee strongly encourages the Government to continue its efforts to remove children from armed conflict and ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. In this regard, it requests the Government to continue to supply information on the number of children under 18 years of age who have been rehabilitated and reintegrated into their communities as a result of these measures.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Congo

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2002)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or similar practices. Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's statement that there is child trafficking between Benin and the Congo for the purpose of forcing children to work in Pointe-Noire in trading and domestic work. According to the Government, the children are forced to work all day in harsh conditions by their host families, and are subjected to all kinds of hardships. The Committee noted that sections 345, 354 and 356 of the Penal Code lay down penalties for anyone found guilty of the forcible or fraudulent abduction of persons including young persons under 18 years of age. It requested the Government to indicate to what extent sections 345, 354 and 356 of the Penal Code have been implemented in practice. The Committee requests the Government once again to supply information on the application of sections 345, 354 and 356 of the Penal Code in practice, including, in particular, statistics on the number and nature of offences reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penalties imposed.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration. Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous observations, the Committee noted the Government's statement acknowledging that the trafficking of children between Benin and the Congo for the purpose of forcing children to work in Pointe-Noire in trading and domestic work is contrary to human rights. It also noted that the Government has taken certain measures to curb child trafficking, including: (a) the repatriation by the Consulate of Benin (airport) for minors (young person under 18 years of age) to have administrative authorization to leave the territory of Benin. The Committee asked the Government to provide information on the impact of the measures taken with regard to the rehabilitation and social integration of children following their withdrawal from labour. It noted that the Government's report does not contain any information on this subject. The Committee requests the Government once again to supply information on the time-bound measures taken to remove young persons under 18 years of age from this worst form of child labour and to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. It also requests the Government to supply information on the impact of these measures.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee noted that, according to the concluding observations of the Committee on the Rights of the Child on the initial report of the Congo of October 2006 (CRC/C/COG/CO/1, paragraph 85), a study of the root causes and repercussions of trafficking is due to be conducted in the country. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on the results of this study and to supply a copy of it once it has been prepared.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Costa Rica

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1976)

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. The Committee previously noted the statistics contained in the report on the results of the national study on work by children and young persons in Costa Rica, published in June 2003 by the National Statistical and Census Institute and the Ministry of Labour and Social Security, in collaboration with ILO-IPEC and the Statistical Information and Monitoring Programme on Child Labour (SIMPOC), according to which 49,200 children under 15 years of age were working in Costa Rica. It noted that the second National Action Plan for the prevention and elimination of child labour and the special protection of young workers was reviewed and formulated in 2007 to bring it into line with the new Government policies, and particularly the National Development Plan (2006–10). The Committee also observed that according to the information contained in an ILO-IPEC report of June 2008 on the third phase of the project entitled "Elimination of child labour in Latin America" (ILO-IPEC report of June 2008), there was a slight reduction in work by young persons. However, the statistics on child labour provided by the Government only concern the Central Region of Costa Rica and do not give an overall view of the problem in the country.

The Committee notes the information provided in the Government's report on the implementation of the National Action Plan for the prevention and elimination of child labour and the special protection of young workers. It notes that a system to follow up and evaluate the National Action Plan was developed during the course of 2009. The results of this evaluation were due to be presented during the course of 2010 and will make it possible to provide more precise information on the impact of the measures adopted in the context of the Action Plan. While awaiting these results, the Committee observes that between August 2008 and January 2009 the measures adopted in the context of the Action Plan included the provision of economic support for 300 child workers with a view to maintaining them in the education system through the programme "Avanceamos". Moreover, awareness-raising activities on the risks and consequences of child labour have been carried out with 50 entrepreneurs in the agricultural sector and 2,297 fishers.

The Committee also notes the Government's indication that the household survey envisaged in 2009 does not allow measurement of the extent of work by children between the ages of five and 12 years, nor does it provide information on the characteristics of work by children and young persons. A specific module on child labour has therefore been adopted, which should be applied in practice during the course of 2010. The Committee nevertheless notes the statistics provided in the Government's report concerning the violations reported by the labour inspectorate in 2008 and 2009. It observes that in 2008 the labour inspectorate detected 186 cases of child labour in Costa Rica, and 168 in 2009. The majority of these cases were reported in the Central Region, namely in San José, Heredia and parts of Cartago. The 2008 statistics also show that the sectors with the largest number of cases identified are commerce (43 per cent) and services (19 per cent). The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the impact of the measures taken in the context of the National Action Plan for the prevention and elimination of child labour and the special protection of young workers as soon as the results of the evaluation become available. It also expresses that firm hope that statistics disaggregated by sex and age group and on the nature, extent and trends of work by children and young persons below the minimum age will be provided in the near future.

Article 2(1). Minimum age for admission to employment or work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted a contradiction between, on the one hand, section 89 of the Labour Code, which establishes a minimum age of 12 years for admission to employment and, on the other, sections 78 and 92 of the Code of Children and Young Persons, which sets this minimum age at 15 years, in accordance with the minimum age specified when the Convention was ratified. The Government indicated that, in the legal system in Costa Rica, the principle is applied whereby a standard contained in a special law has priority over that set out in a general law. Moreover, the principle also applies that the most favourable standard and the most beneficial conditions must be implemented. Accordingly, in the present case, the Code of Children and Young Persons has precedence over the Labour Code. While noting this information, the Committee observes that, in view of the child labour statistics involving children under 15 years of age in the country, it would be desirable for the provisions of the Labour Code to be brought into line with those of the Code of Children and Young Persons.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that it will undertake to provide information on any review of the national legislation in this respect. The Committee firmly encourages the Government to take the necessary legislative measures to harmonize the provisions in the national legislation respecting the minimum age for admission to employment or work. It requests the Government to continue providing information on any progress achieved in this respect.

Article 3(2). Determination of hazardous types of work. Further to its previous comment, the Committee notes with interest the Government's indication that the Bill to prohibit young workers from performing hazardous and unhealthy types of work has been included on the agenda of the Commission on Childhood and Youth of the Legislative Assembly. The Committee expresses the firm hope that this Bill will be adopted in the very near future and requests the Government to provide a copy as soon as it has been adopted.

Finally, the Committee notes that a Bill on the employment of young persons is currently being examined by a special commission of the Social Affairs Commission of the Legislative Assembly. It requests the Government to continue providing information on the progress achieved in this respect and to supply a copy of the Bill as soon as it has been adopted.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes the communication of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) of 26 August 2009, as well as the Government's reply dated 22 October 2009.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (d). Hazardous work. Child domestic work. The Committee notes the allegations made by the ITUC that nearly 6 per cent of the 113,500 children working in Costa Rica are employed in domestic work. It notes that the ITUC's comments refer to the ILO-IPEC study of 2002 entitled "Child domestic labour in Central America and the Dominican Republic", which revealed that one girl in every four under 18 years of age who works is engaged in the domestic sector in Costa Rica. According to the ITUC, these children work long days, are paid little if at all, are often the victim of physical and sometimes sexual violence, are exposed to hazardous working conditions and often have no access to education. Furthermore, child domestic workers are isolated since their activities are carried out within the private sphere, which makes them extremely vulnerable to all forms of abuse. However, the Committee notes that, according to the ITUC's comments, a Bill prohibiting young workers from carrying out hazardous and unhealthy work was submitted to the legislative assembly in 2005 and includes provisions regulating child domestic work. Furthermore, a Bill on domestic work was also submitted to the legislative assembly in the same year.

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the ITUC's allegations, which indicates that, under the Code of Childhood and Adolescence (section 94), it is prohibited to employ children under 15 years of age (sections 78 and 92) and children aged between 15 and 18 years may not be engaged in activities that jeopardize their own safety or that of other persons placed under their responsibility. Furthermore, the working time of children aged between 15 and 18 years is limited to six hours per day or 36.6 hours per week (section 95). Furthermore, the Committee notes the Government's indication concerning the drafting of the Bill on domestic work and its forthcoming adoption. It also notes that the Bill prohibiting young workers from carrying out hazardous and unhealthy work contains provisions on child domestic work.

The Committee notes with interest the adoption of Act No. 8842 of 13 August 2010 amending the Code of Childhood and Adolescence, which provides that domestic work by children aged between 15 and 18 years is prohibited in the following conditions: (i) if the young person must sleep at the workplace; (ii) if the work requires the young person to look after children, elderly persons or disabled persons; and (iii) if the work consists of supervision (section 94bis). Furthermore, it notes that the Bill prohibiting young persons from carrying out hazardous and unhealthy work envisages the prohibition of child domestic work carried out in these same conditions. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that children under 18 years of age who are engaged in domestic work benefit from the protection guaranteed by the national legislation in practice and, in this regard, it requests the Government to provide statistics on the number and type of violations observed and the penalties applied. Furthermore, it expresses the hope that the Bill prohibiting young persons from carrying out hazardous and unhealthy work will be adopted very soon and that it will contain provisions on child domestic work. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (d). Children at special risk. Child domestic workers. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its reply to the allegations made by the ITUC. It notes in particular that an awareness-raising campaign was conducted on child domestic work between 2003 and 2006 through the television and radio media. According to the Government, four programmes have also been created in collaboration with the NGO World Vision with the aim of identifying and providing assistance for 120 child domestic workers. Considering that children engaged in domestic work are particularly exposed to the worst forms of child labour, the Committee requests the Government to redouble its efforts to protect these children from the worst forms of child labour by taking specific measures to provide the necessary and appropriate direct assistance to remove these children from hazardous work and ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. It requests the Government to provide detailed information on the measures taken to that end. Furthermore, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved in the context of the abovementioned programmes, including the number of children who have benefited from these measures.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Côte d'Ivoire

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2003)

Article 2(1) and (4) of the Convention. Scope of application. The Committee previously noted that, under section 23(8) of Act No. 95/15 of 12 January 1995 (Labour Code), children may not be employed in an enterprise, even as apprentices, before the age of 14 years, unless an exemption is provided for by means of regulations. It noted that, under this provision, the minimum age for admission to employment or work applies only to an employment relationship and that consequently no minimum age for admission to employment or work is laid down for children who perform an economic activity outside this employment context, especially in the informal sector or on a self-employed basis.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the letter and spirit of the Labour Code applies to any type of employment relationship, including the informal sector. It also notes the information provided by the Government under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), that the Labour Code extends to professional relationships, whether remunerated or not, and that the employment contract does not need to be in written form. However, it notes that the Government recognizes that self-employed persons do not benefit from this protection, but that numerous provisions of the bill prohibiting the trafficking of children and the worst forms of child labour ensure the protection of children working on a self-employed basis.

While noting the adoption of Act No. 2010-272 of 30 September 2010 prohibiting the trafficking of children and the worst forms of child labour, the Committee observes that this Act aims to prohibit and combat the worst forms of child labour defined in accordance with Article 3 of Convention No. 182, and does not therefore cover all categories of work and employment. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in practice to ensure that children working on a self-employed basis are afforded the protection provided for by the Labour Code.

Article 2(3). Age of completion of compulsory schooling. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to UNICEF statistics for 2000–06, the net school attendance rate at primary level was 57 per cent for girls and 66 per cent for boys, while at secondary level, it was 22 per cent for girls and 32 per cent for boys. The Committee further noted that, according to the 2008 Education for All: Global Monitoring Report published by UNESCO entitled “Education for All by 2015: Will we make it?”, Côte d’Ivoire is one of four countries which are at serious risk of not achieving the objective of universal primary education for all by 2015 and the country is unlikely to achieve gender parity in primary and secondary education.

The Committee notes the measures taken by the Government to improve the functioning of the education system and increase the school attendance rate, at both primary and secondary levels. These measures include the lifting of restrictions relating to the wearing of school uniforms, the distribution of free school textbooks in public schools and establishments, free access to preparatory classes and reduced registration fees in secondary schools, as well as the introduction and improvement of school canteens in order to provide cheaper catering for pupils. The Committee also notes the information provided by the Government concerning the implementation of an awareness-raising policy designed to increase the school attendance rate of girls in urban and rural environments, in partnership with UNICEF and local non-governmental organizations.

The Committee takes due note of these measures designed to increase the school attendance rate. However, it notes that, according to UNICEF statistics for 2003–08, the net school attendance rate at primary level has not increased. It also notes that, although section 1 of Act No. 95-696 of 7 September 1995 concerning education (the Education Act) provides that all citizens are guaranteed the right to education, no provision guarantees the compulsory nature of schooling or lays down the age of completion of compulsory schooling. Considering that compulsory education is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, the Committee urges the Government to adopt legislation introducing compulsory schooling and establishing the age of completion of compulsory schooling so as to prevent children from engaging in work. It encourages the Government to continue taking effective measures to improve the functioning of the education system, in particular by increasing the school attendance rate at both primary and secondary levels, paying particular attention to gender disparities in access to education. Furthermore, it once again requests the Government to intensify its efforts to combat child labour by strengthening measures enabling working children to enter the formal or informal school system or take up vocational training, providing that minimum age criteria are respected.

Article 6. Apprenticeships. The Committee previously noted that sections 12.2–12.11 of the Labour Code govern apprenticeships. It also noted that section 23.8 of the Code prohibits children from being employed in an enterprise, even as apprentices, before the age of 14 years, unless an exemption is provided for by regulations. Furthermore, it noted that, under section 3 of Decree No. 96-204 of 7 March 1996 concerning night work, children under 14 years of age engaged in an apprenticeship or in pre-vocational training may not undertake work under any circumstances during the limitation period for night work or in general during the period of 15 consecutive hours from 5 p.m. to 8 a.m. The Committee requested the Government to indicate whether exemptions provided for by section 23.8 of the Labour Code have been adopted by regulation allowing children under 14 years of age to embark on an apprenticeship.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government that the texts implementing section 23.8 of the Labour Code have not yet been enacted to allow children under 14 years of age to embark on an apprenticeship and that an exemption to that effect will probably be envisaged in the context of the reform of the Labour Code. Recalling once again that, under Article 6 of the Convention, the age for admission to work in enterprises in the context of an apprenticeship programme is 14 years, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to harmonize the Labour Code and Decree No. 96-204 of 7 March 1996 with the Convention and to establish a minimum age of 14 years for embarking on an apprenticeship.

Article 9(1). Penalties. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that Order No. 2250 of 14 March 2005 establishing the list of hazardous types of work prohibited to children under 18 years of age does not provide for any penalty for violations of section 1. The Committee also noted that a bill prohibiting the trafficking of children and hazardous child labour was being drawn up.

The Committee notes with satisfaction that, under section 19 of Act No. 2010-272 of 30 September 2010, anyone who has a child in their care or supervises a child if they are in charge of the child’s education or his or her intellectual or professional development, who knowingly forces or allows that child to carry out hazardous work, shall be liable to a prison sentence of between one and five years. Furthermore, section 6 provides that hazardous work shall mean work included on the list established by Ministry of Labour Order No. 2250 of 14 March 2005.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to a national survey on child labour undertaken in 2005, children are mainly employed in agriculture (cereal, coffee, or cocoa crops), commercial activities and industry. According to this study, 19 per cent of children are involved in harmful activities. Moreover, 83 per cent of economically active children engage in harmful activities and 17 per cent in hazardous types of work. Furthermore, one in five children involved in harmful activities is engaged in a hazardous type of work.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that a new national survey was undertaken in 2008. However, the results of that survey have not yet been validated and have therefore not been provided. The Committee also notes the information provided by the Government that, according to the household standard of living survey carried out in 2008

(ENV 2008), 71.6 per cent of economically active children are employed in agriculture and 97.1 per cent are engaged in activities harmful to their health. Furthermore, the Committee notes that, according to the national child labour survey carried out in 2005, the majority of children forced to carry out harmful activities are under 15 years of age. Thus, 89.7 per cent of children engaged in harmful activities are under 15 years of age. Furthermore, the survey shows that more children are involved in these types of activities in rural areas compared to urban areas and that 328,000 children were affected in 2005. It also notes that, according to UNICEF statistics for 1999–2008, 35 per cent of children aged between 5–14 years in the country are working. While noting the adoption of new legislative provisions prohibiting and punishing the performance of hazardous work by children under 18 years of age, the Committee observes that many children under the minimum age for admission to employment are engaged in harmful activities and hazardous work and therefore requests the Government to redouble its efforts to improve the child labour situation in the country, particularly the situation of children working in cocoa production and hazardous types of work. Furthermore, it requests it to provide the results of the 2008 national survey as soon as they have been validated. Finally, the Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the application of the Convention in practice, including, for example, statistics disaggregated by gender and age concerning the nature, extent and trends of the work of children and young persons working below the minimum age specified by the Government at the time of ratification, and extracts from the reports of the inspection services.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2003)

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption of Act No. 2010-272 of 30 September 2010 prohibiting the trafficking and worst forms of child labour. It notes that section 4 of the Act prohibits the worst forms of child labour, which are defined in conformity with this provision of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of Act No. 2010-272 of 30 September 2010, including statistics on the number and nature of the violations reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions applied.

Clause (a). Sale and trafficking of children. The Committee previously noted that sections 370 and 371 of the Penal Code criminalize the abduction of minors. However, it noted that, according to a study carried out by ILO/IPEC/LUTRENA in 2005 entitled “The trafficking of children for the exploitation of their work in the informal sector in Abidjan, Côte d’Ivoire”, these provisions are inadequate to combat the trafficking of children for economic exploitation as they only cover cases of the abduction of minors, whereas the internal or cross-border trafficking of children in Côte d’Ivoire is based on traditional networks for the placement of children and therefore occurs with the consent of the children’s parents or guardians.

In this respect, the Committee notes that sections 21 and 22 of Act No. 2010-272 of 30 September 2010 establishes penalties ranging from 10 to 20 years of imprisonment. It also observes that, in accordance with sections 2 and 3, the Act applies to all children under 18 years of age residing or staying on the territory of Côte d’Ivoire.

The Committee notes that, according to the “Trafficking in persons report 2010 – Côte d’Ivoire”, published on the website of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (www.unhcr.org), Côte d’Ivoire is primarily a country of destination for children and women subjected to trafficking in persons. Trafficking within the country’s borders is more prevalent, with victims primarily trafficked from the north of the country to the more economically prosperous south. The great majority of boys who are victims of trafficking are from Ghana, Mali, Burkina Faso, Benin and Togo and are exploited in the agricultural sector, particularly in cocoa plantations. Girls from Ghana and Nigeria are also exploited as domestic workers and for prostitution. While taking due note of the new legislative provisions which prohibit and penalize the sale and trafficking of children, the Committee observes that this worst form of labour is a problem in practice. Recalling that under the terms of Article 3(a) of the Convention, the sale and trafficking of children under 18 years of age for economic or sexual exploitation is one of the worst forms of child labour and that, under the terms of Article 1, immediate and effective measures shall be taken as a matter of urgency to secure the prohibition and elimination of this worst form of child labour, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure in practice the protection of children under 18 years of age against sale and trafficking, in accordance with Act No. 2010-272 of 30 September 2010.

Articles 3(d) and 4(1). Hazardous work. Gold mines. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that child labour in mines is one of the 20 types of hazardous work covered by section 1 of Order No. 2250 of 14 March 2005 and is prohibited for children under 18 years of age. It observed that, although the legislation is in conformity with the Convention on this point, child labour in mines is a problem in practice.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that many multinational enterprises are entering this sector and are provided with a list of conditions drawn up by the Ministry responsible for mining and energy, which prohibits the use of child workers. According to the Government, these companies do not employ children. However, the Government’s report indicates that the exploitation of child labour has been reported on mining sites under concession to private persons. It also notes that the Government and its development partners undertook awareness-raising campaigns while awaiting the application of Act No. 2010-272 of 30 September 2010. In this respect, the Committee observes that, under section 19 of this Act, persons who supervise or are in charge of a child and who cause the child to, or knowingly allow, the child to perform hazardous work may be liable to a penalty of up to five years of imprisonment. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take immediate and effective measures to bring an end to the practice of child labour in mines, in accordance with the prohibition set out in law.

Articles 5 and 7(1) of the Convention. Monitoring mechanisms and penalties. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that 14 persons had been arrested and imprisoned in 2008 for child trafficking and it requested the Government to provide the court decisions in their cases.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the 14 persons arrested and imprisoned in 2008 for the trafficking of children have not yet been convicted. It also notes the Government's indication that the Sub-directorate to Combat the Trafficking of Children and Juvenile Delinquents of the national police organized several training workshops and seminars between 2006 and 2009 to strengthen the technical capacities of the officers and agents of the defence and security forces in relation to combating the trafficking and worst forms of child labour. According to the Government's report, the major objective of these measures is to enable them to be more effective in the identification of child victims of trafficking and the worst forms of labour. The Committee accordingly notes that, between June 2006 and June 2009, the national police services identified and intercepted 321 child victims of trafficking, including 124 cases of trans-border trafficking.

However, the Committee notes that, according to the report on the trafficking of persons referred to above, the police in Côte d'Ivoire demonstrate a weak understanding of the trafficking of children. During raids on brothels, the police tend to consider children working there in voluntary prostitution rather than as potential victims of trafficking. Furthermore, no training to reinforce the capacities of the agents and law enforcement officers and immigration for the identification and treatment of victims of trafficking was provided during the period covered by the report. The report also indicates that only one person was convicted of the trafficking of children, namely a Nigerian woman who was convicted in May 2009 to a sentence of three years of imprisonment by the court of Daloa for exploiting two young girls for the purposes of prostitution. The report adds that on two occasions, in February and June 2009, child traffickers intercepted by the police managed to escape, thereby evading conviction. The Committee therefore urges the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure that persons engaging in the sale and trafficking of children under 18 years of age are prosecuted and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are applied, under the terms of Act No. 2010-272 of 30 September 2010. In this respect, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that thorough investigations and robust prosecutions of offenders are carried out, particularly by strengthening the capacities of the authorities responsible for the enforcement of the law. It requests the Government to provide any court rulings given against the traffickers imprisoned in 2008, as well as the ruling of May 2009 of the court of Daloa.

Article 6(1). Programmes of action to eliminate the worst forms of child labour. National Plan of Action to combat the trafficking and worst forms of child labour. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report under the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), according to which a National Plan of Action (2007–09) to combat the trafficking and worst forms of child labour (National Plan of Action) was adopted in 2007. The objective of the National Plan of Action is to reduce the incidence and, in due course, eradicate trafficking and other worst forms of child labour in Côte d'Ivoire. It is articulated around five strategic axes of intervention, aiming in particular to reinforce activities for the prevention and removal, reintegration and repatriation of child victims of trafficking and other worst forms of child labour, as well as the reinforcement of the human, material and structural capacities of the actors involved in the implementation of the Plan of Action. However, the Committee notes the Government's indication that very few activities have been undertaken up to now that are directly related to the National Plan of Action due to the lack of financing. Furthermore, most of the action taken on the issue of child trafficking and child labour is focused on the cocoa sector, including the establishment of a system to monitor child labour in cocoa plantations (SSTE), covering several administrative departments of the production zone. Finally, the Committee observes that, according to the strategic document of the National Plan of Action, Phase I of the Plan, which was initially to have lasted for 18 months, has still not been implemented and the time frame for the envisaged activities has not been followed. The Committee urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure the implementation in practice of the National Plan of Action. It requests the Government to continue supplying information on its implementation, with an indication of the action taken and the results achieved, particularly with regard to the number of children working in the cocoa sector who are in practice removed from cocoa plantations, as well as the rehabilitation and social integration measures adopted for those children.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Removing children from the worst forms of child labour and ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration. Sale and trafficking of children. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes with interest the Government's indication that, in the context of the implementation of the ILO/IPEC/LUTRENA project, the measures adopted have resulted in the removal and placement in school of 840 children aged between 5 and 17 years, of whom 44 were victims of trafficking, during the period covered by the report. Furthermore, around 200 persons who are active in combating the trafficking of children received training, including 30 members of volunteer host families on caring for and supporting child victims of trafficking. The LUTRENA project also provided support for the formulation of the National Plan of Action to combat trafficking and the worst forms of child labour. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that 145 child victims of trafficking received support from the National Committee to Combat the Trafficking and Exploitation of Children (CNLTEE) in 2007, while the numbers were 46 in 2008 and 9 in 2009. While noting that the LUTRENA project was completed on 31 March 2010, the Committee strongly encourages the Government to continue taking immediate and effective measures for the removal of child victims of sale and trafficking, and requests it to continue providing information on the number of children who have in practice been removed from this worst form of child labour. The Committee also requests the Government to provide detailed information on the specific rehabilitation and social integration measures adopted to ensure the access of child victims of sale and trafficking to free basic education and vocational training.

Article 8. International cooperation. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that Côte d'Ivoire had signed the multilateral cooperation agreement of 27 July 2005 to combat the trafficking of children in West Africa, as well as the regional multilateral cooperation agreement to combat the trafficking of children in West and Central Africa in July 2006. The Committee previously requested additional information on the measures adopted for the implementation of these multilateral agreements.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the cooperation resulting from these agreements is only operational in the form of repatriation operations for child victims of trafficking. It also notes that this cooperation does not include the exchange of information intended to identify child trafficking networks and arrest the persons engaged in these networks. Furthermore, it notes from the 2010 report on trafficking that the Ministry of the Family, Women and Social Affairs undertook repatriation operations for 20 child victims of trafficking from Burkina Faso, Benin, Ghana and Togo during the period covered by the report. The Committee observes that a third follow-up meeting on the 2005 multilateral agreement was held in July 2008 in Niamey, Niger. In view of the prevalence of trans-border trafficking in the country, the Committee strongly encourages the Government to take concrete and effective measures for the implementation of the multinational agreements signed in 2005 and 2006, and particularly for the establishment of a system for the exchange of information to facilitate the identification of child trafficking networks and for the arrest of the persons engaged in those networks. It also requests the Government to provide information on the results of the third follow-up meeting held in Niamey in July 2008.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee previously noted that, according to a national survey of child labour conducted in 2005 in the country, it is estimated that 1.1 per cent of children between the ages of 5 and 17 years are victims of internal trafficking, while 10.4 per cent of child victims of trafficking are victims of trans-border trafficking, and that 52 per cent of them are from Burkina Faso and 31 per cent from Ghana. The towns most affected by trafficking are Bas Sassandra, Nzi, Comoé and Abidjan. It also noted that 17 per cent of economically active children are involved in hazardous types of work.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that, according to the national survey conducted in 2002 on the situation of child labour in the cocoa sector, over 600,000 children between the ages of 6 and 17 years are involved in this type of production, among whom 127,000 are engaged in work that is considered to be hazardous. It further notes the Government's indications that a survey on the living standards of households was conducted in 2008 (ENV 2008). The results of the survey have not yet been validated. However, the Committee observes that, according to the information supplied in the Government's report under Convention No. 138, the results of the ENV 2008 survey show that two children out of 1,000 are victims of trafficking, and that 97.1 per cent of economically active children are engaged in activities that are harmful for their health. While taking due note of the adoption of the new legislative provisions prohibiting and penalizing the worst forms of child labour, the Committee observes that a large number of children are victims of trafficking and are engaged in hazardous activities and it therefore urges the Government to pursue its efforts to ensure the protection in practice of children against these worst forms of child labour. It also requests it to provide the statistics gathered in the context of the ENV 2008 survey as soon as the results have been validated. To the extent possible, all information provided should be disaggregated by sex and age.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1991)

Article 2(1) of the Convention. Scope of application. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the protection afforded by the Convention is also applicable to children who work without an employment relationship, in particular when they are self-employed. In this regard, it had asked the Government to adapt and strengthen the labour inspection services with regard to self-employed children or children working in the informal sector. The Committee notes with satisfaction the Government's indication that a new Labour Act No.149/2009 has come into force from 1 January 2010 (new Labour Act). It notes that according to section 17 of the new Labour Act, a person under 15 years of age or a person of 15 years of age or above and under 18 years of age, attending compulsory education must not be employed. The Committee further notes that section 18(1) of the new Labour Act stipulates that the legal capacity of minors to conclude employment contracts commences at the age of 15 years. The Committee finally notes that according to the statistical information provided by the Government on the number and nature of infringements discovered by the labour inspectorate, no cases of the self-employment of children under the age of 15 years were detected.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Democratic Republic of the Congo

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes the Government's report. It also notes the detailed discussion held in the Committee on the Application of Standards during the 98th Session of the International Labour Conference in June 2009.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or similar practices.

1. Sale and trafficking of children for sexual exploitation. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes that section 174(j) of Act No. 06/018 of 20 July 2006, amending and supplementing the Decree of 30 January 1940 issuing the Congolese Penal Code, provides that any act or transaction relating to the trafficking or exploitation of children or any other person for sexual purposes in return for remuneration or any other benefit shall be punished by penal sanction ranging from ten to 20 years. It also notes that Act No. 9/001 of 10 January 2009 respecting the protection of children establishes a penalty of from ten to 20 years of penal servitude for both the sale and trafficking of children (section 162), and for the sexual slavery of a child (section 183). Nevertheless, the Committee observes that the Government's report does not provide information on the application in practice of the legislation respecting the sale and trafficking of children for sexual exploitation. It further notes that, in its concluding observations of 10 February 2009, the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC/C/COD/CO/2, paragraph 10), while welcoming the adoption of Act No. 09/001 of 10 January 2009, expressed concern that the enacted laws are not always followed by the issuance of appropriate decrees for implementation, that law enforcement mechanisms are weak and that no activities have been carried out to raise awareness of these laws which are, consequently, not applied or implemented. Furthermore, the Committee notes that, in its conclusions, the Committee on the Application of Standards noted that, although the law prohibited the trafficking of children for labour or sexual exploitation, it remained an issue of serious concern in practice and, accordingly, called on the Government to take immediate and effective measures to eliminate the trafficking of children under 18 in practice. The Committee joins the Committee on the Application of Standards in urging the Government to renew its efforts and to take immediate and effective measures to ensure the elimination of the sale and trafficking of children under 18 years of age for sexual exploitation, thereby ensuring the application in practice to section 147(j) of the Penal Code and Act No. 09/001 of 10 January 2009. In this respect, it once again requests the Government to provide statistics on the number and nature of the infringements reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penalties imposed under the above legal texts.

2. Forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that article 184 of the transitional Constitution provides that no one shall be recruited into the armed forces of the Democratic Republic of the Congo or take part in war or hostilities unless they have reached the age of 18 years at the time of recruitment. It also noted that the Government had adopted Legislative Decree No. 066 of 9 June 2000 concerning the demobilization and reintegration of vulnerable groups present within the fighting forces. The Committee further noted that, according to the two reports of the United Nations Secretary-General on children and armed conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo of 28 June 2007 (S/2007/391) and on children and armed conflict of 21 December 2007 (A/62/609–S/2007/757), the number of children recruited by the armed groups and armed forces had fallen by 8 per cent, which can be attributed in particular to the progress made in the implementation of the National Programme for the Disarmament, Demobilization and Reintegration of Children, the integration of the army, the reduction in the number of combat zones and the action taken by child protection networks against the recruitment of children.

The Committee takes due note of the fact that Act No. 09/001 of 10 January 2009, provides in section 87 for a penalty of penal servitude of from ten to 20 years for the enrolment or use of children under 18 years of age in armed forces and groups and the police. However, the Committee notes the Government's indication that, despite the progress achieved in the suppression of the enrolment of children, the persistence of combat areas is increasing the risk of enrolment. According to the Government's report, this is occurring in Ituri and in the two Kivu provinces, where recent cases of the abduction of children have been reported.

The Committee also notes the report of the United Nations Secretary-General on children and armed conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo of 9 July 2010 (S/2010/369, paragraphs 17–41), for which the period covered extends from October 2008 to December 2009. According to this report, 1,593 cases of the recruitment of children (1,519 boys and 74 girls) were reported over the period under consideration, including 1,235 in 2009, which is a slight fall in relation to 2008 (1,522 cases reported). Nevertheless, the Committee observes that the Armed Forces of the Democratic Republic of the Congo (FARDC) appear to have the largest number of children in their ranks. Indeed, according to the report of the Secretary-General, 42 per cent of the total number of cases of recruitment reported have been attributed to the FARDC, and 594 new cases of the recruitment of children have been identified in their ranks by the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (MONUC), principally in the eastern region. The report reveals the existence of evidence confirming that hundreds of children associated with armed groups have been integrated into the FARDC without being concealed or hidden by their commander, particularly in North Kivu, where accelerated integration operations for armed groups into the national Congolese army have been undertaken in the absence of any coordination with institutions for the protection of children or supervision by these institutions. Accordingly, the number of children present in the ranks of the FARDC is reported to have increased spectacularly in 2009 due to the children present in the units that have been integrated, who represent 78 per cent of the cases of the recruitment of children in the FARDC. The Committee notes from the report of the Secretary-General that children recently integrated into the FARDC have been transferred to regions that are distant from their place of recruitment to participate in the “Kimia II” operation (a joint FARDC–MONUC operation) or in military operations in Haut-Uélé. Furthermore, the Presidential Guard is reported to have recruited at least 35 children before and during deployment in Haut-Uélé. With regard to the geographical location of this phenomenon, the Committee notes the information contained in the report of the Secretary-General indicating that the province of North Kivu has the great majority of cases reported in 2009 (82 per cent). Cases have also been identified in North Katanga and in the two Kasai provinces, where no cases had been reported in 2008. According to the report, the use of child recruitment in areas not affected by the conflict may principally be explained by the high recruitment quotas imposed on FARDC commanders.

The Committee also notes with concern that, according to the report of the Secretary-General, the number of incidents involving the killing and maiming of children has increased, mainly in zones of military operations. The majority of the incidents reported are attributed to the Lords’ Resistance Army (LRA). However, nine cases of murders and 11 cases of maiming have also been attributed to elements of the FARDC. Furthermore, according to the Secretary-General, sexual violence against children continues to be a subject of serious concern. A significant increase in the number of abductions of children has also been observed over the period covered by the report. These are principally carried out by the LRA, although seven cases of the abduction of children by FARDC brigades have also been reported. The abducted children state that they were mainly used for combat, forced labour or were subject to sexual abuse.

The Committee observes that the Committee on the Rights of the Child in its concluding observations of 10 February 2009 (CRC/C/COD/CO/2, paragraph 67), expressed grave concern that the State, through its armed forces, bears direct responsibility for violations of the rights of the child and that it had failed to protect children and prevent such violations. The Committee of Experts also notes the observation by the Committee on the Rights of the Child that children have been arrested, detained and tried in military courts for military offences and other crimes allegedly committed while they were in the armed forces or groups, instead of being treated as victims (CRC/C/COD/CO/2, paragraph 72).

The Committee observes that, despite the adoption of Legislative Decree No. 066 of 9 June 2000 concerning the demobilization and reintegration of vulnerable groups present within the fighting forces, and of Act No. 09/001 of 10 January 2009, which prohibits the enrolment and use of children under 18 years of age in armed forces and groups and the police, children continue to be recruited and forced to join rebel armed groups and the regular armed forces of the Democratic Republic of the Congo. The Committee expresses deep concern at the persistence of this practice and the increase in the number of children recruited by the FARDC. It also once again expresses its grave concern at the practice of the detention of children for presumed association with armed groups and their judgement by military tribunals, which constitutes a flagrant violation of international standards. The Committee urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures as a matter of urgency to ensure that children under 18 years of age are not forcibly recruited into the ranks of the armed forces of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and requests it to provide information on the measures taken in this regard. With reference to Security Council Resolution No. 1906 of 23 December 2009, in which it “demands that all armed groups immediately stop recruiting and using children and release all children associated with them”, the Committee urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure that thorough investigations and robust prosecutions of any persons, including officers in the regular armed forces, who forcibly recruit children under 18 years of age for use in armed conflict, are carried out and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are applied to them in practice, in accordance with Act No. 09/001 of 10 January 2009. It requests it to provide information on the number of investigations conducted, prosecutions and convictions against such persons.

Article 3(d). Hazardous work. Mines. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the comments by the Confederation of Trade Unions of the Congo according to which young persons under 18 years of age are employed in mineral quarries in the provinces of Katanga and East Kasai. It noted that the United Nations Special Rapporteur, in her report of April 2003 on the situation of human rights in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (E/CN.4/2003/43, paragraph 59), noted that military units are recruiting children for forced labour, especially for the extraction of natural resources. The Committee observes that, although the legislation is in conformity with the Convention on this point, child labour in mines is a problem in practice and it therefore requested the Government to supply information on the measures which will be taken by the labour inspectorate to prohibit hazardous work by children in mines and to provide information on the effective application of the legislation on the protection of children in practice against hazardous work in mines.

The Committee notes that the Government’s report does not provide information on this subject. It observes that, in the context of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, the Worker member of the Democratic Republic of the Congo indicated that the labour inspectorate is not effective in view of the lack of staff and resources, and that it does not therefore have the capacity to address the problem of children working in mines. The Committee joins the Committee on the Application of Standards in urging the Government to take the necessary measures to reinforce the capacities of the labour inspectorate with a view to ensuring that children under 18 years of age engaged in hazardous types of work in mines benefit from the protection afforded by the national legislation. In this respect, it once again requests the Government to provide information on the application of provisions concerning this worst form of child labour, particularly through the communication of statistics on the number and nature of the offences reported and the penalties imposed.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour, removing them from such work and ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration.

1. Sale and trafficking of children for sexual exploitation. The Committee noted previously that the Government has established a multi-sectoral cooperation and action framework to prevent and respond to violence inflicted upon women, young persons and children, and that this framework includes the ministries responsible for human rights, women and the family and for social affairs, United Nations agencies, including UNICEF and UNDP, as well as NGOs. The action taken in this context includes the adoption of laws on sexual violence, awareness raising so that victims report their aggressors, psychological and social support for victims, medical treatment through the creation or reinforcement of health centre facilities to provide suitable care for victims, and legal support through the creation of legal advice centres. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the impact of these measures. Noting the absence of information in the Government's report on this subject, the Committee once again asks the Government to provide concrete information on the number of child victims of sale and trafficking for sexual exploitation who have in practice been removed from this worst form of child labour and on the specific measures adopted to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration.

2. Child soldiers. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the operational framework for children associated with armed forces and groups envisaged by the National Programme for Disarmament, Demobilization and Reintegration had been launched in May 2004, and that around 30,000 children, including those who had been released before the adoption of the operational framework, were separated from the armed forces and groups between 2003 and December 2006. The Committee however noted that the issue of registering girls and removing them from the armed forces is a sensitive matter. The fear of being socially excluded if they are found to have been associated with armed forces or groups means that girls prefer to return discreetly to civilian life. The Committee also noted that programmes for the economic reintegration of children are hampered by the lack of possibilities available to improve their economic situation and the financial problems arising from a lack of long-term support mechanisms under the Programme. As a result, the children are at risk of being re-enlisted in the armed forces or groups. With regard to measures for psychological rehabilitation, the Government also acknowledged that the transitional support structures are deficient.

The Committee notes that, according to the report of the United Nations Secretary-General on children and armed conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo of 9 July 2010 (S/2010/369, paragraphs 30 and 51–58), the number of children released in 2009 more than tripled in comparison with 2008, particularly in the province of North Kivu. Between October 2008 and the end of 2009, some 3,180 children (3,004 boys and 176 girls) left the ranks of the armed forces and groups or fled and were admitted to reintegration programmes. However, the Committee notes with concern the information provided in the report of the Secretary-General according to which on many occasions the FARDC has refused access to the camps to child protection institutions seeking to verify the presence of children in their units and that the commanders refuse to release children.

The Committee also observes that there are many obstacles to effective reintegration, such as the constant insecurity and the continued presence of former recruiters in the same region. According to the report of the Secretary-General, family reunion activities were suspended in certain regions of North Kivu during the course of 2009 in view of the high risk of re-engagement and the intimidation of children formerly associated with the armed forces and groups. The Committee also notes that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations of 10 February 2009 (CRC/C/COD/CO/2, paragraph 72), expresses concern at the fact that several thousands of child victims recruited or used in hostilities have not been provided with measures for recovery and integration and that certain of these children have been re-recruited in the absence of alternatives and assistance for demobilization. According to the report of the Secretary-General, girls associated with the armed forces and groups (around 15 per cent of the total number of children) rarely have access to reintegration programmes. Indeed, only 7 per cent of them benefit from assistance through national disarmament, demobilization and reinsertion programmes. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government to the effect that the structure of the unit for the implementation of the Programme for Disarmament, Demobilization and Reintegration needs to be strengthened. The Committee urges the Government to redouble its efforts and to take effective and time-bound measures to reinforce the National Programme for Disarmament, Demobilization and Reintegration with a view to continuing to remove children from armed groups and forces and ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration, paying special attention to girls. In this respect, it requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved in terms of the number of children who have benefited from social and economic reintegration measures.

3. Children who work in mines. The Committee notes the Government's reply to the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards indicating that several projects for the prevention of child labour in mines and the reintegration of these children through education are being implemented. It notes the information provided in the Government's report according to which these projects are intended to cover a total of 12,000 children, of whom 4,000 are to be covered by prevention measures and 8,000 removed with a view to their reintegration through vocational training. With reference to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards, the Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information in its next report on the specific measures adopted in the context of these projects to prevent children under 18 years of age from working in mines and to provide the necessary and appropriate direct assistance for their removal from these worst forms of child labour and to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. In this respect, it requests the Government to provide information on the number of children who are in practice removed from these worst forms of child labour and who have benefited from reintegration measures through vocational training.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 2(1) of the Convention. Minimum age for admission to employment or work. The Committee recalled that, under section 3 of the Employment of Children Prohibition Ordinance, the minimum age of admission to employment was 12 years and that, under section 4, subsections (1) and (5), of the Employment of Women, Young Persons and Children Ordinance, the minimum age is 14 years. The Government, however, specified a minimum age of 15 years when it ratified the Convention. It once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures in order to raise the statutory minimum age to 15 years, in accordance with this provision of the Convention.

The Committee further noted that the statutory provisions on minimum age applied only to persons employed under an employment relationship or under a contract of employment, whereas the Convention also covered work performed outside any employment relationship, including work performed by young persons on their own account. The Committee once again expresses the hope that the Government will indicate the measures taken or envisaged to give full effect to the Convention on this point.

Article 3. Hazardous work. The Committee recalled that no higher minimum age had been fixed for work which is likely to jeopardize the health, safety or morals of young people, other than night work. It once again urges the Government to take measures so as to set such higher minimum age(s) in accordance with Article 3(1) of the Convention, and to determine the types of employment or work to which higher minimum age(s) should apply, in accordance with Article 3(2) of the Convention.

Article 7. Light work. The Committee noted that the national legislation allowed exceptions to the above minimum ages as regards the employment of children under the age of 12 years in domestic work or agricultural work of a light nature at home by the parents or guardian of such children (section 3 of the Employment of Children Prohibition Ordinance) and the employment of children under the age of 14 years in an undertaking or on a ship where only members of the same family are employed (section 4, subsection 1 and section 5, of the Employment of Women, Young Persons and Children Ordinance). The Committee recalled that under this Article of the Convention, national laws or regulations may permit the employment or work of persons 13–15 years of age on light work which is: (a) not likely to be harmful to their health or development; and (b) not such as to prejudice their attendance at school, their participation in vocational orientation or training programmes approved by the competent authority or their capacity to benefit from the instruction received. Another condition is that the activities involved and the conditions of work and employment should be determined by the competent authority. It once again expresses the hope that the Government will take measures to restrict, in accordance with this provision, the possibility to employ children below the minimum age specified, and to determine the activities and conditions of their employment or work.

As regards the Government's reference to the work of family members as the category excluded under Article 4, the Committee pointed out that the exceptions under this provision must be listed in the first report after ratification, and that the Government declared in its first report, received in February 1988, that no use was made of this provision.

Article 9(3). Keeping of registers. The Committee noted that section 8(1) of the Employment of Women, Young Persons and Children Ordinance provided for the keeping of registers or lists of young persons of less than 16 years of age, whereas the Convention describes the keeping of such registers of persons of less than 18 years of age. It noted the Government's indication that this provision is not applied in practice. The Committee nevertheless pointed out that the Government has an obligation to give effect to the provisions of the Convention in law and practice. It therefore once again asks the Government to take the necessary measures so that registers or other documents are kept by the employer concerning workers younger than 18 years of age.

The Committee noted the Government's indication that the provisions of the Convention are upheld by custom and practice. Pending the necessary amendments to the legislative provisions as requested above, the Committee once again asks the Government to supply detailed information on how the Convention is applied in practice, as required under Part V of the report form, including, for instance, extracts from official reports, statistics, and information on inspection visits made and contraventions reported.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Dominican Republic

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes that the Government's report contains no reply to its previous comments. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

Article 2(1) and (4) of the Convention and Part V of the report form. Minimum age for admission to employment or work and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the comments made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, now the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), according to which child labour is a major problem in the Dominican Republic. Owing to high unemployment and poverty, particularly among the Haitian community, children enter the labour market at a young age and work in the informal economy or in agriculture. Moreover, the number of Haitian children working in sugar plantations alongside their parents is increasing. In reply to the ITUC's observations, the Government indicated that the Dominican Republic is a very poor country and that it could not deny that children enter the labour market at a very young age. However, with the technical assistance of the ILO–IPEC, it is taking measures to eliminate child labour, for example to remove children who are working in the agricultural sector. The Government also indicated that all children, irrespective of their nationality and including children of Haitian nationality, have to attend school. Furthermore, the Secretariat of State for Labour, in collaboration with the Secretariat of State for Education (SEE), has formulated a plan of action under which labour inspectors who identify children not attending school have to inform the SEE, irrespective of their nationality.

The Committee noted that, according to the statistics contained in the Report on the results of the national study on child labour in the Dominican Republic, published in 2004 by the ILO–IPEC, SIMPOC and the Secretariat of State for Labour, around 436,000 children aged between five and 17 years, were working in the Dominican Republic in 2000. Of these, 21 per cent were aged between five and nine years and 44 per cent were between ten and 14. The Committee noted that the sectors of economic activity most affected by child labour were services in urban areas and agriculture in rural areas. Furthermore, there were also many children working in the commercial and industrial sectors. The Committee noted that, in the context of the ILO–IPEC Time-bound Programme (TBP) on the worst forms of child labour, the Government has implemented several programmes of action in the agricultural and urban sectors to eliminate child domestic labour. According to the information available to the Office, these programmes should benefit around 25,200 boys and girls under 18 years of age and over 2,850 families. The Committee noted the adoption of the National Strategic Plan for the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour (2006–16), which is the country’s response to resolving the problem of child labour.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that, in collaboration with the ILO–IPEC, it continues to take steps to eliminate child labour, in particular to remove children from agricultural plantations. Furthermore, an ongoing awareness-raising campaign on the radio and television has been launched in the country’s towns. The Committee also notes that the Government is participating in the ILO–IPEC project entitled “Elimination of child labour in Latin America (Central American component)”. It also notes the adoption of a Decent Work Country Programme (2008–11) and that it takes into account child labour. Furthermore, it notes that the TBP is still in progress in the country.

The Committee notes that, according to the statistics mentioned above, the application of the legislation on child labour seems difficult and that child labour constitutes a problem in practice in the country. It expresses its deep concern at the situation of children under the age of 14 years who are compelled to work in the Dominican Republic. The Committee firmly requests the Government to step up efforts to abolish child labour in the country. In this regard, it requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken within the framework of the National Strategic Plan for the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour (2006–16), the ILO–IPEC project on the elimination of child labour in Latin America, the Decent Work Country Programme (2008–11) and the TBP, in particular on the programmes of action which will be implemented to gradually abolish child labour. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved. It also invites the Government to provide information on the application of the Convention in practice, including, for example, statistical data on the employment of children and adolescents, extracts from the reports of the inspection services, particularly inspections carried out in the sectors mentioned above.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

Articles 3(a) and 7(1), of the Convention. Sale and trafficking of children for commercial sexual exploitation, and penalties. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the observations made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), to the effect that the trafficking of human beings, including children, for commercial sexual exploitation, was a serious problem in the Dominican Republic, particularly in the tourist industry. The ITUC added that, despite the severe penalties set out in the national legislation for the trafficking of persons and the efforts made by the Government to eliminate this practice, the problem remained very widespread. The Committee noted that, according to the 2002 ILO–IPEC study entitled “Commercial sexual exploitation of young persons in the Dominican Republic”, the children involved in the commercial sexual exploitation sector were aged between 10 and 17 years. It noted that the Dominican legislation prohibits the sale and trafficking of children for the purposes of sexual and economic exploitation. The Committee also noted that, in the context of the ILO–IPEC Regional Project entitled “Participation in preventing and eliminating the commercial sexual exploitation of children in Central America, Panama and the Dominican Republic” (Regional Project against CSEC), legislative measures were to be adopted to amend Act No. 137-03 of 7 August 2003 on the smuggling of migrants and the trafficking of persons and the Penal Code with a view to reflecting accurately the content of international instruments on the trafficking of persons, including trafficking for commercial sexual exploitation.

The Committee notes the Government’s information that the review of the Penal Code is being carried out in order to penalize clients and intermediaries of sale and trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation and establish new minimum penalties for commercial sexual exploitation. Moreover, Act No. 137-03 is also being revised.

The Committee notes that the 2009 Report on Trafficking in Persons in the Dominican Republic (Trafficking Report), available on the Office of the High Commissioner for Refugees web site (www.unhcr.org), indicates that the Dominican Republic is a source, transit and destination country for men, women and children trafficked for the purposes of commercial sexual exploitation and forced labour. A significant number of women, boys and girls are trafficked within the country for forced prostitution and domestic servitude. In some cases, parents push children into prostitution to help support the family. Child sex tourism is a problem, particularly in coastal resort areas, with child sex tourists arriving year round from various countries, particularly Spain, Italy, Germany, Canada and the United States and reportedly numbering in the thousands. Haitian nationals, including children, who voluntarily migrate illegally to the Dominican Republic, may subsequently be subjected to forced labour in the service, construction and agricultural sectors. According to the same source, notwithstanding trafficking investigations continued during 2008, since 2007 there have been no convictions on trafficking charges under Act No. 137-03 and the Government did not show evidence of progress in prosecuting and punishing trafficking offenders. Moreover, according to the 2010 Interim Assessment for the Trafficking Report, also available at the website of the Office of the High Commissioner for Refugees (www.unhcr.org), the Government has made limited progress in combating trafficking in persons since the release of the 2009 Report. The Attorney General's Office did not report any efforts to prosecute trafficking offenders and no trafficking cases were identified. The Committee finally notes that, according to the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC) 2009 Global Report on Trafficking in Persons, a human trafficking division within the national police was established in January 2008 to investigate cases of human trafficking. In addition, the Anti-Trafficking Unit of the Attorney-General's office is tasked with investigating and prosecuting human trafficking and related crimes. Between 2007 and 2008, the human trafficking division investigated five cases of trafficking in persons, none of which involved children.

The Committee expresses its concern at the persistence of the problem of trafficking of children for commercial sexual exploitation and forced labour in the country as well as at the limited anti-trafficking law enforcement efforts to address the issue. The Committee therefore urges the Government to redouble its efforts to strengthen the capacity of law enforcement agencies in order to ensure that persons who traffic in children for the purposes of sexual or labour exploitation are in practice prosecuted, and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed. It also requests the Government to provide information on the number of infringements reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions applied for violations of the legal prohibitions on the sale and trafficking of children. To the extent possible, all information provided should be disaggregated by sex and age. It finally hopes that the review of the provisions of the Penal Code and of Act No. 137-03 on trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation will be completed in the very near future and requests the Government to provide information in this regard.

Article 6. Programmes of action. 1. Trafficking. National Plan against Trafficking. The Committee notes the Government's information that the inter-agency National Commission Against Trafficking elaborated the National Plan against Trafficking. It requests the Government to provide information on the programmes of action established in the context of the National Plan against Trafficking and the results achieved in terms of the elimination of the trafficking of children.

2. Commercial sexual exploitation. National Plan for the Elimination of the Abuse and Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Boys, Girls and Young Persons. In its previous comments, the Committee noted with interest the National Plan for the Elimination of the Abuse and Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Boys, Girls and Young Persons (National Plan against CSEC) and the activities envisaged therein to combat commercial sexual exploitation in the country. The Committee notes that, according to the ILO-IPEC project "Developing a road map to make Central America, Panama, and the Dominican Republic a child-labour free zone" (Road Map), among the achievements of the National Plan against CSEC 2003-13, assistance is offered by the National Council on Children and Adolescents (CONANI) to child and adolescent victims of commercial sexual exploitation. The Committee requests the Government to continue to take measures in the framework of the implementation of the National Plan against CSEC and to provide information on results achieved in terms of the elimination of the commercial sexual exploitation of children.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (a). Preventing children from becoming engaged in the worst forms of child labour. Commercial sexual exploitation. 1. Time-bound Programme (TBP) and ILO-IPEC Regional Project. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the commercial sexual exploitation of children was one of the worst forms of child labour in respect of which the Government had undertaken to adopt measures as a priority in the context of the ILO-IPEC TBP on the worst forms of child labour.

The Committee notes that various measures have been adopted, both in the context of the ILO-IPEC project "Supporting the Time-bound Programme for the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour in the Dominican Republic - Phase II (2006-09)" (TBP, phase II), and in the context of the ILO-IPEC Regional Project against CSEC, to raise awareness on the commercial sexual exploitation of children. It also notes that, according to the technical progress report of September 2009 on the TBP, phase II, 56 children have been prevented from commercial sexual exploitation through the provision of educational services or training opportunities. The Committee requests the Government to continue to take measures to prevent the engagement of children in commercial sexual exploitation and to provide information in this regard.

2. Tourist industry. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the ILO-IPEC Regional Project against CSEC provides for the strengthening of national institutional capacities. It requested the Government to provide information on the measures adopted for this purpose. As the country benefits from widespread tourist activity, the Committee also requested the Government to indicate whether measures have been taken to raise awareness among actors directly related to the tourist industry, such as associations of hotel owners, tourist operators, unions of taxi drivers and owners of bars, restaurants and their employees.

The Committee notes that, according to the final technical progress report of July 2009 of the ILO-IPEC Regional Project against CSEC, major institutional coordination has been promoted by providing specialized technical assistance to the Inter-institutional Commission against Abuse and Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children. Moreover, human resources at key institutions (childcare institutions, police, district attorneys and judges) were trained for the improvement of programmes for child victims through training workshops and education materials. The Committee notes the Government's information that a project against commercial sexual exploitation in Las Terrenas is being carried out. It further notes the Government's information that an ethical code for the tourism sector is being implemented and that awareness-raising activities on commercial sexual exploitation have been carried out in the tourist industry. The Committee requests the Government to continue to take measures to raise awareness among actors directly related to the tourist industry and to provide information in this regard. It also asks the Government to provide information on the results of the project against commercial sexual exploitation in terms of preventing the commercial sexual exploitation of children.

Clause (b). Direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration. Commercial sexual exploitation. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes that, according to the technical progress report of September 2009 on the TBP, phase II, 80 children have been removed from commercial sexual exploitation through the provision of educational services or training opportunities. The Committee requests the Government to continue to take measures to provide the necessary and appropriate direct assistance for the removal of children from commercial sexual exploitation and for their rehabilitation and social integration. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate whether reception centres for child victims of commercial sexual exploitation have been established in the country, with an indication of the number of children actually received by such centres; and whether specific medical and social follow-up programmes have been formulated and implemented for child victims of commercial sexual exploitation.

Article 8. International cooperation. 1. Commercial sexual exploitation. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the ILO–IPEC Regional Project against CSEC envisaged the strengthening of horizontal collaboration between countries participating in the project. The Committee notes that, according to the final technical progress report of July 2009 of the ILO–IPEC Regional Project against CSEC, horizontal collaboration between countries participating in the project was strengthened, inter alia, through: developing a regional database with approximately 400 institutions working on the theme of commercial sexual exploitation of children; exchanging information between district attorneys and police officers on sexual crimes and experiences in police investigation methods; and supporting the stakeholders concerned (such as migration offices, the Commission of Central American Chiefs of Police and the INTERPOL Subregional Office) in the common fight against trafficking of children. The Committee requests the Government to continue to take measures to cooperate at the regional and international levels in order to eliminate the commercial sexual exploitation of children. It also requests it to provide information on further measures taken in this regard and results achieved.

2. Poverty reduction. The Committee previously noted that both the Strategic National Plan for the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour (2006–16) and the National Plan against CSEC envisaged strategic measures for the reduction of poverty in the country. It also noted that, according to the statistical data provided by the Government, around 60 per cent of minors under 14 years of age lived in poverty in 2001.

The Committee notes with interest the Government's information that the conditional cash transfer programme “Solidaridad”, which is one of the programmes implementing the national strategy to reduce poverty (Social Protection Network), has been launched. It notes the Government's information that “Solidaridad” signed a cooperation agreement with ILO–IPEC in order to link the activities of “Solidaridad” with the ongoing ILO–IPEC programmes of action in the country. The Committee further notes that fighting poverty as a way to prevent and progressively eradicate child labour and eliminate its worst forms is one of the objectives of the Road Map. As a way to achieve this objective, the coverage of “Solidaridad” is projected to increase by 2020 and priority is to be given to poorest families with children under 18 years at risk of being involved or involved in the worst forms of child labour. In particular, the number of poor families who are beneficiaries of “Solidaridad” is projected to increase from 409,696 in 2009 (37.55 per cent of the total number of families in situations of poverty) to 700,000 in 2020 (87.5 per cent), and the total number of families who are beneficiaries with children from 6 to 16 years is projected to increase from 427,116 in 2009 to 891,656 in 2020. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the results of the implementation of the “Solidaridad” programme and the ILO–IPEC project Road Map, particularly in terms of the effective reduction of poverty among children removed from commercial sexual exploitation and from sale and trafficking for this purpose.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Ecuador

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes that the Government's report contains no reply to its previous comments. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the statistical information from the National Institute of Statistics and Census (INEC) of 2005, to the effect that the number of child workers between 5 and 17 years of age in the country was decreasing. It also noted the Government's statement that the child labour inspection and monitoring service had been reinforced since 2004. The Committee also noted that Ecuador had implemented a Time-bound Programme (TBP) in order to eliminate the worst forms of child labour, particularly the work of children in the banana and flower industries.

The Committee noted with interest the detailed information sent by the Government concerning the results achieved further to the implementation of the TBP, which ended in June 2008. A total of 7,406 children were beneficiaries of the TBP. Of these,

5,250 children were prevented from becoming involved in one of the worst forms of child labour covered by the TBP and received educational services, and 2,156 children were removed from their work and were also provided with educational services. The Committee noted the detailed information provided by the Government on the measures taken to implement other programmes of action, such as the “Being” project and the “Pro-child” programme, for abolishing child labour and the worst forms thereof. Moreover, it noted the Government’s indication that a review of the “National Plan for the prevention and elimination of child labour” is in progress. The Committee also noted the detailed information provided by the Government on the results of the second national survey of child labour carried out by the INEC in 2006. According to this survey, 580,888 children and young persons were employed in forms of child labour to be abolished under the terms of the Convention. Of these, 164,551 were children between 5 and 11 years of age, 202,585 were adolescents between 12 and 14 years of age, and 213,752 were young persons engaged in hazardous work between 15 and 17 years of age. The Committee noted that, according to the national survey of child labour for 2006, child labour has decreased by 3 per cent in comparison with 2001.

The Committee also noted that, according to ILO–IPEC information, the Government has adopted various public policies, including the “Social agenda for children and young persons”, the “Ten-year National Plan for the full protection of children and young persons” and the “National Development Plan”. In the context of these public policies concerning children, measures will be taken to combat child labour. The Committee also noted that the Government is participating in the ILO–IPEC project on the “Elimination of child labour in Latin America (third phase, South America)”. While duly noting the measures taken by the Government to combat child labour, the Committee again noted that, according to the abovementioned statistics, the practice observed is still in contradiction with the legislation and the Convention. The Committee is deeply concerned at the situation of children under 14 years of age who are compelled to work and urges the Government to intensify its efforts to gradually improve the situation. It requests the Government to take the necessary steps, in the context of the various public policies mentioned above and the ILO–IPEC project on the “Elimination of child labour in Latin America”, to abolish child labour. It requests the Government to supply information on the results achieved. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the application of the Convention in practice, including, for example, statistics relating to the employment of children and young persons, and extracts of the reports of the inspection services, particularly inspections conducted in the abovementioned sectors. Finally, it requests the Government to supply a copy of the new “National Plan for the prevention and elimination of child labour”, once it has been formulated.

Article 2(2) and (5). Raising the minimum age for admission to employment or labour to 15 years. The Committee noted the Government’s statement that Act No. 2006-39 raised the minimum age for admission to employment or work from 14 to 15 years, thereby aligning the provisions of section 134(1) of the Labour Code with those of section 82(1) of the Children and Young Persons Code of 2003. It requested the Government to consider the possibility of sending the ILO Director-General a new declaration stating that Ecuador had raised the previously specified minimum age, in accordance with Article 2(2) of the Convention. The Government indicated that it will recommend that the Ministry of Labour and Employment notify the Director-General that the minimum age for admission to employment or work has been raised from 14 to 15 years. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on any new developments in this regard.

Article 2(3). Age of completion of compulsory schooling. The Committee noted that, according to UNICEF statistics for 2006, the net primary school enrolment rate was 98 per cent for girls and 97 per cent for boys and the figures for secondary schools were 53 per cent for girls and 52 per cent for boys. The Committee duly notes that, according to the Education for All (EFA) Global Monitoring Report 2008 published by UNESCO entitled “Education for All by 2015: Will we make it?”, Ecuador has achieved the objective of universal primary education for all and that of gender parity in both primary and secondary education. The Committee duly notes the net primary school enrolment rate. However, it expresses its concern with regard to the low net secondary school enrolment rate. It observes that poverty is one of the primary causes of child labour and, combined with a deficient education system, it hampers the development of the child. Considering that compulsory education is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, the Committee urges the Government to continue its efforts to improve the functioning of the education system in the country and to take measures to enable children to attend compulsory basic education or enter an informal school system. In this regard, it requests the Government to supply information on the measures taken to increase the secondary school enrolment rate. Finally, the Committee requests the Government to supply information on the results achieved.

Article 3(2). Determination of hazardous work. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee noted with satisfaction Resolution No. 016 CNNA-2008 of 8 May 2008, adopting regulations on hazardous work which is prohibited for young persons who are legally entitled to work in employment or on a self-employed basis. This resolution was adopted in consultation with the employers’ and workers’ organizations, and also with various other parties concerned with the problem of child labour. The Committee noted in particular that section 5 of these Regulations contains a very detailed list of types of work prohibited for young persons between 15 and 18 years of age. It also noted that section 6 of the Regulations fixes at 18 years of age the minimum age for admission to employment for young domestic workers who live in the homes of their employers. The Committee further noted the Government’s statement that agreements concerning the types of work prohibited for young persons between 15 and 18 years of age in the banana and flower industries have been concluded. The Committee requests the Government to supply a copy of these agreements in its next report. It also requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of Resolution No. 016 CNNA-2008 adopting regulations on hazardous work.

Article 8. Artistic performances. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government’s statement that Regulations issued under the Children and Young Persons Code will lay down the conditions of employment for children and young persons engaged in artistic activities or performances. The Committee noted the Government’s information to the effect that the Regulations implementing the Children and Young Persons Code are in the process of being validated. The Committee reminded the Government that, under Article 8(1) of the Convention, the competent authority may waive the minimum age of 14 years specified by Ecuador for admission to employment or work and, after consultation of the employers’ and workers’ organizations concerned, may grant permission in individual cases for purposes such as participation in artistic performances. It also reminded the Government that according to Article 8(2) the permits so granted must limit the number of hours during which, and prescribe the conditions in which, employment or work is allowed. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the regulations implementing the Children and Young Persons Code will be adopted in the near future, will take account of the comments made above and will lay down the conditions of employment for children and young persons in artistic performances. It requests the Government to supply information on any new developments in this regard.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes that the Government's report contains no reply to its previous comments. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

Article 3(a) and (b) of the Convention and Part III of the report form. Sale and trafficking of children for commercial sexual exploitation, the use of children for prostitution and court decisions. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to ILO-IPEC statistics, over 5,200 children were victims of commercial sexual exploitation or trafficking for this purpose in Ecuador. It also noted the adoption of Act No. 25-447 of 23 June 2005, reforming the Penal Code, which categorizes crimes involving the sexual exploitation of young persons under 18 years of age and establishes heavy penalties for persons found guilty of having committed a crime established under this Act.

The Committee noted that, according to a 2007 report on the worst forms of child labour in Ecuador, available on the UNHCR website (www.unhcr.org), Colombian girls are trafficked to Ecuador for commercial sexual exploitation, and Ecuadorian children are trafficked to neighbouring countries and Spain. According to this report, it would seem that most children are trafficked within the country to urban centres, particularly for prostitution. The Committee also noted that the Committee on the Protection of the Right of Workers and their Migrant Families, in its final observations on Ecuador's initial report on December 2007 (CMW/C/ECU/CO/1, paragraph 32), while recognizing the efforts undertaken by the National Council for Children and Young Persons against the commercial sexual exploitation of children and trafficking for this purpose, was nevertheless concerned at the involvement of migrant children in prostitution, especially in the Lago Agrio region, and at the fact that there still seemed to be a sort of social acceptance of this criminal behaviour against children in Ecuadorian society.

The Committee noted the information provided by the Government on the denunciations received by the National Police Unit specialized in the welfare of boys, girls and young persons (DINAPEN) concerning the commercial sexual exploitation of children. It noted that, between 2006 and June 2008, there had been a total of 184 denunciations, of which 153 concerned prostitution, including trafficking, 24 child pornography and eight sexual tourism. The Committee took note of the Government's statement that, since 2005, 14 persons have been sentenced for the exploitation of children under 18 years of age for sexual purposes in the cities of Machala and Quito. In Quito, five sentences were handed down for the trafficking of children for sexual exploitation and one for the procuring of children, while in Machala, five sentences were handed down for trafficking for sexual exploitation, two for procuring and two for pornography. The penalties applied ranged from between three and five years' imprisonment. The Committee encourages the Government to continue its efforts to ensure, in practice, the protection of children under 18 years of age against these worst forms of child labour. In this respect, it requests the Government to continue to provide information on the application of the provisions of the Penal Code applying to the crimes of sexual exploitation against minors of less than 18 years of age in practice. Furthermore, taking account of the information that persons have been prosecuted and sentenced, the Committee requests the Government to provide copies of the judgements handed down by virtue of the provisions in the Penal Code in its next report.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing children from being engaged in the worst forms of child labour, removing them from these forms of labour and ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration. Commercial sexual exploitation of children and the trafficking of children for this purpose. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, in the context of the Time-bound Programme (TBP), programmes of action were to be implemented to combat the commercial sexual exploitation of children and the trafficking of children for this purpose. In this respect, the Committee noted, with interest, the detailed information provided by the Government on the results obtained following the implementation of the TBP, which ended in June 2008. It noted, more particularly, that a total of 1,174 children who were victims of commercial sexual exploitation or trafficking for this purpose benefited from the TBP. Out of this number, 1,037 children, of which 692 were girls and 345 boys, were prevented from being engaged in these worst forms of child labour, and 137 children, of which 135 were girls and two boys, were removed from these worst forms of child labour. The Committee further noted that, according to the Government, the children who benefited from the TBP also received assistance in re-entering the formal or informal education system, or received vocational training. What is more, temporary accommodation and social and legal assistance were provided to the children who had been removed from these worst forms of child labour. Finally, assistance, especially in the form of grants, were offered to the families of children benefiting from the TBP.

The Committee took due note of the Government's indication that it has adopted a national plan to combat the trafficking of persons, the illicit traffic of migrants, sexual exploitation, economic and other forms of exploitation, the prostitution of women, boys, girls and young persons, child pornography and the corruption of minors (National Plan to combat the trafficking of persons and commercial sexual exploitation). The Committee also noted that, in the districts of Cuenca and Machala, plans to combat the commercial sexual exploitation of children and trafficking of children for this purpose have also been drawn up. Furthermore, according to the ILO-IPEC final report on the TBP of June 2008, the National Programme of protection for children and young people who are victims of commercial sexual exploitation or trafficking for this purpose is still in operation in the cities of Quito and Machala and will also be implemented in the region of Lago Agrio. The Committee strongly encourages the Government to continue its efforts and requests it to provide information on the time-bound measures taken, when implementing the National Plan to combat the trafficking of persons and commercial sexual exploitation and the plans to combat the commercial exploitation of children and the trafficking of children for this purpose in Cuenca and Machala, to: (a) prevent children from being victims of commercial sexual exploitation or trafficking for this purpose; and (b) provide the necessary and appropriate direct assistance to remove child victims from these worst forms of child labour. It requests the Government to continue providing information on the results obtained. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the implementation of the National Programme of protection for children and young persons who are victims of commercial sexual exploitation or trafficking for this purpose, especially with respect to the measures taken in the context of this programme to guarantee the rehabilitation and social integration of the victims of this worst form of child labour.

Article 8. International cooperation and assistance. Commercial sexual exploitation of children and trafficking of children for this purpose. In its previous comments, the Committee expressed the hope that, in the context of the implementation of the TBP, the Government would take measures to cooperate with neighbouring countries, particularly through the reinforcement of security measures on common borders. In this respect, the Committee took due note of the information provided by the Government that it participated in a meeting with Peru and Colombia to coordinate actions with a view to exchanging information on the commercial sexual exploitation of children and the trafficking of children for this purpose. Agreements had been reached on an exchange of information between the police and judicial services. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the exchanges of information with Peru and Colombia, carried out in the context of the agreements signed between the police and judicial services, have made it possible: (a) to identify and arrest persons working in networks involving the trafficking of children; and (b) to detect and intercept child victims of trafficking at the borders.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1999)

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy on the effective abolition of child labour and the application of the Convention in practice. The Committee previously noted that, according to the 2005 report of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), 6 per cent of children aged 5–14 are involved in labour activities, mostly in the agricultural sector (in both commercial and subsistence agriculture). The ITUC report also indicated that children often work in repair and craft shops, in the brick making and textile sectors and in leather and carpet-making factories. The ITUC report stated that there was evidence of employers who abuse, overwork and endanger child workers. However, the Committee also noted the numerous measures taken by the Ministry of Manpower and Migration (MoMM) within the framework of the National Child Labour Strategy (adopted in 2006). These measures included the creation of a central database on child labour, the provision of services to working children and their families, and the development of poverty-alleviation programmes to help prevent children from entering the labour force or to return to school.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that, while the central database on child labour is still being developed, the Central Body for Public Mobilization and Statistics is undertaking a comprehensive survey on child labour, in collaboration with the ILO. The Committee also notes the Government's statement that child labour is not as widespread as indicated in the ITUC report and that the statistics in the ITUC report do not reflect the present reality of the situation in Egypt, particularly in light of the efforts of the Government over the last year. In this regard, the Committee notes the information in a report on the UNICEF Egypt website (www.unicef.org/egypt) on working children, that the issue of child labour is difficult to quantify in the country, and that different studies offer divergent figures on the number of working children. This UNICEF report indicates that the variation between different studies is due to the fact that much of the work performed by children is difficult to measure, as it is seasonal (UNICEF indicates that over a million children are hired each season to bring in the Egyptian cotton crop) and performed in the informal sector.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that its efforts on the ground to eliminate child labour have been strengthened. The Government states that the implementation of the National Child Labour Strategy has resulted in the establishment of steering committees in all governorates, by virtue of Ministerial Order No. 227 of 2009. These steering committees will translate the National Child Labour Strategy into a national plan of action, with participation from governmental and non-governmental organizations. The Committee also notes that the work of the steering committees has resulted in the reintegration of 122 children into basic education, the enrolment of 109 children in literacy classes, the provision of social and health services to 789 children, the signing of 428 apprenticeship contracts, and the holding of awareness-raising sessions for 515 children. The Committee further notes that the World Food Programme is implementing the Combating Child Labour Project, in Beni Suef, Adyut and Sohag, which provides both in-school and take-home food to school children.

The Committee notes the information in the Survey of Young People in Egypt (Preliminary Report) of February 2010 (produced by the Egyptian Cabinet Information and Decision Support Centre and the Population Council) that 81 per cent of working children between the ages of 10 and 14 are in rural areas, with 53 per cent working in agriculture and 28 per cent working in construction. The Survey indicates that working children come from poorer households, with 65 per cent of working children between the ages of 10 and 14 coming from households in the two lowest income quintiles. While noting the efforts made by the Government to combat child labour, the Committee must express its concern at the number and situation of working children under the minimum age in Egypt and urges the Government to strengthen its efforts, within the framework of the National Child Labour Strategy, to ensure the progressive elimination of child labour. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the impact of measures taken in this regard, particularly with respect to measures focusing on children in rural areas (including those engaged in seasonal work in the cotton sector) and children from low-income households. The Committee also requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the comprehensive survey on child labour of the Central Body for Public Mobilization and Statistics' includes both children working on a seasonal basis and in the informal sectors, and to provide the results of this survey, once available.

Article 2(2). Raising the initially specified minimum age for admission to work. The Committee previously noted the Government's statement that the Children's Act No. 12 of 1996 (Children's Act) was amended by Law No. 126 of 2008, to raise the minimum age of employment to 15 years. In this regard, the Committee notes with satisfaction that on 1 June 2010 the Government sent a declaration to the Director-General indicating that it was officially raising the minimum age for admission to employment or work from 14 to 15 years, thus bringing the minimum age fixed by national law into line with that prescribed at the international level.

Part III of the report form. Labour inspection. The Committee previously noted that, the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations, noted that 80 per cent of child labour is reportedly concentrated in the agricultural sector (CRC/C/15/Add. 145, paragraph 49, of 21 February 2000). The Committee also noted that a separate unit within the MoMM is responsible for child labour investigations in the agricultural sector. It noted that inspections were carried out in small family enterprises in the agricultural sector to ensure that the working conditions conformed to those prescribed under Order No. 118 of 2003 (specifying that children under the age of 18 years may not be employed in several agricultural occupations) and Order No. 1454 of 2001 (on child labour in agriculture and cotton harvesting). The Committee further noted that, in the course of labour inspections, 3,677 children were found to be working by labour inspectors and that 436 violations of employers' obligations were detected, involving 277 children. The Committee requested the Government to indicate if these statistics included the agricultural sector, and to provide information on the number of fines issued. The Committee also requested the Government to provide a copy of Order No. 1454 of 2001.

The Committee notes the copy of Order No. 1454 of 2001 submitted with the Government's report. The Committee also notes the Government's statement concerning the statistics submitted with its previous report, that the 436 violations resulted in the issuance of 124 citations, and that these inspections included the agricultural sector. The Committee further notes the information in the Government's report that, in the first quarter of 2010, the following violations were registered: 106 violations for employing persons under the minimum age, 68 violations of Order No. 118 (involving 68 children) and six violations involving children in agriculture. The Government indicates that citations were issued for these violations. In addition, the Committee notes the detailed child labour inspection report submitted with the Government's report under the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), on the number of child labour violations detected by the labour inspectorate in each region of the country. Lastly, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the child labour inspectorate coordinates with community-based organizations in each of the governorates, and that a child labour monitoring and tracking system has been set up for children working in agriculture.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. Sale and trafficking of children. The Committee previously noted that while the sale and trafficking of children for the purpose of sexual exploitation was prohibited, Egypt did not have specific legislation prohibiting the sale and trafficking of children under 18 years of age for labour exploitation. However, the Committee noted that section 4 of Law No. 126 of 2008 on Amending Provisions of the Child Law, Penal Code and Civil Status (Law No. 126), sought to amend the Penal Code by adding section 291, which stated that "any person who sells, buys or offers a child for selling in addition to delivering, receiving or moving a child as a servant, sexually or commercially exploiting the same or employing him in compulsory work or other illegal purposes, shall be punished by imprisonment for not less than five years and a fine of at least 50,000 Egyptian Pounds (EGP) and maximum EGP200,000". The Committee requested the Government to indicate if this provision included all persons under 18 years of age.

The Committee notes that Law No. 126 was adopted on 15 June 2008, and notes the Government's statement that the prohibition of trafficking in the Penal Code applies to all persons under 18 years of age. In this regard, the Committee notes with satisfaction that, pursuant to section 4 of Law No. 126, the Penal Code was amended to include section 291 (prohibiting the sale and trafficking of a child for both sexual and labour exploitation), and that pursuant to section 1 of Law No. 126, section 2 of the Child Law was amended to define a child as every person under 18 years of age. The Committee further notes the information in a report on trafficking in persons in Egypt of 14 June 2010 (Trafficking Report), available on the website of the Office of the High Commissioner for Refugees (www.unhcr.org), that in May 2009, an Alexandria court convicted two men of trafficking pursuant to the amendments contained in Law No. 126. The court sentenced one of the traffickers to 15 years' imprisonment, and the other to life in prison.

Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of a child for prostitution. The Committee previously noted that, according to the text of the Child Law dated October 2008, section 94 of the Child Law provides that the age of criminal responsibility in law starts at 7 years and that section 111 of the Child Law provides that children aged between 15 and 16 years are liable to confinement in jail for not less than three months.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that Egyptian law considers a child who has been exploited sexually and commercially to be a victim, and not a criminal. However, the Committee observes that the Government's report does not provide information on whether children who are victims of commercial sexual exploitation may still be charged with the criminal offence of perversion. While the Government's report provides information on the penalties for persons who violate the right of a child to protection against commercial sexual exploitation (pursuant to section 291 of the Penal Code (as amended)), it appears that section 291 does not address the issue of the criminal liability of the child victim of this offence. In this regard, the Committee notes the information the Trafficking Report that victims of trafficking (many of whom are victims of commercial sexual exploitation) are often detained and children may be sent to juvenile detention, rather than offered rehabilitative services. The Committee therefore once again urges the Government to ensure that child victims of prostitution are treated as victims rather than offenders. In this regard, it requests the Government to take immediate measures to ensure that children under 18 who are used, offered or procured for the purpose of prostitution are not liable to a criminal offence under national legislation.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (a). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour. Trafficking of children for commercial sexual and labour exploitation. The Committee previously noted that Egypt is a country of transit for underage girls from Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union who are trafficked into Israel for labour and sexual exploitation, and a source country for children trafficked within the country for commercial sexual exploitation and domestic servitude. The Committee also noted the establishment of the “National Coordinating Committee to Combat and Prevent Trafficking in Persons” (NCC) in July 2007 and that the National Council for Children and Motherhood (NCCM) established a unit specializing in combating child trafficking. It further noted the launching of an awareness campaign entitled “Stop human trafficking immediately”. It requested information on the impact of these measures.

The Committee notes the Government’s statement that there is no child trafficking in Egypt. However, the Committee notes the Government’s statement in its report to the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW) of 5 September 2008, that Egypt is a transit country for victims from African and South-East Asian countries, the former Soviet Republics, and Eastern European countries and that the Suez Canal is a main transit route for human trafficking (CEDAW/C/EGY/7 page 25). The Committee also notes the statement in the compilation of United Nations documents submitted to the Human Rights Committee for the Universal Periodic Review of 26 November 2009 that UNICEF reported several instances of child trafficking in Egypt in 2009 (A/HRC/WG.6/7/EGY/2, paragraph 16). In its report to CEDAW, the Government also identifies a new type of trafficking, whereby, under the pretence of marriage, wealthy men from neighbouring countries pay poor rural families for “temporary marriages” to their daughters (CEDAW/C/EGY/7, page 25). The Trafficking Report indicates that the victims of these temporary marriages are often under 18 years of age. The Committee further notes the information in the report of the UN Special Rapporteur on trafficking in persons, especially women and children of 20 May 2010, that common forms of trafficking in persons in Egypt include trafficking for the purposes of sexual exploitation of under-aged girls through “seasonal” or “temporary” marriage, child labour, domestic servitude and other forms of sexual exploitation and prostitution (A/HRC/19/32/Add.5, paragraph 9).

Nonetheless, the Committee notes that the Government is taking some measures to combat this phenomenon; the Trafficking Report indicates that the NCCM, following a study on the issue of temporary marriages, launched a campaign against underage marriages to Arab tourists in a governorate where these commercial short-term marriages are common. Moreover, the Committee notes the Government’s statement in its report to the UN Human Rights Committee of 16 November 2009, that the NCC has intensified its awareness campaigns, using the media to raise public awareness of trafficking (A/HRC/WG.6/7/EGY/1, page 20). Despite these measures, the Committee notes that the CEDAW, in its concluding observations of 5 February 2009, expressed concern about the temporary marriages of young Egyptian girls to wealthy men from neighbouring countries, and about the Government’s failure to address the root causes of trafficking (CEDAW/C/EGY/CO/7, paragraphs 25 and 27). The Committee therefore strongly requests the Government to redouble its efforts, through the NCC, to prevent and eliminate the trafficking of children. It requests the Government to provide information on the concrete measures taken in this regard, including initiatives implemented to address the root causes of child trafficking. The Committee also encourages the Government to continue its efforts to raise awareness on the issue of temporary commercial marriages.

Clause (b). Providing the necessary and direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration. The Committee previously noted that the Government does not offer protection services to victims of domestic servitude. It also noted reports that Egypt continued to lack formal trafficking victim identification procedures, so victims of trafficking may be punished for acts committed as a result of being trafficked. The Committee further noted credible reports that indicated that police sometimes arrest street children for prostitution or forced begging and treat them as criminals rather than victims.

The Committee notes the information in the Government’s report to the UN Human Rights Committee of 16 November 2009, that the Ministry of the Interior has set up special units in the Department for the Protection of Public Morals and the Department for Youth Welfare to systematize procedures for dealing with trafficking cases and that a rehabilitation centre for victims of trafficking was established in the Salam district of Cairo (A/HRC/WG.6/7/EGY/1, page 20). The Committee also notes the information in the Trafficking Report that the Ministry of Health (MOH) entered into an agreement with the International Organization for Migration to establish a care centre for trafficking victims in a Cairo public hospital (due to open in 2010), staffed with MOH employees trained in identifying and assisting trafficking victims.

However, the Committee also notes the information in the Trafficking Report that, despite receiving training in victim identification, government officials did not employ formal procedures to identify victims of trafficking or to refer these victims to appropriate services. The Trafficking Report indicates that victims of trafficking, including street children, were often treated as criminals rather than victims, and sent to juvenile detention centres or incarcerated with adults. The Committee expresses its concern at the continued criminalization of child victims of trafficking and urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that child trafficking victims are treated as victims rather than offenders. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to take effective and time-bound measures, as a matter of urgency, to ensure that child victims of trafficking have access to rehabilitation and social integration services.
